Mr. MCMILLAN. That is section 2365 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will look at the statute.

Mr. WINDOM. While the Senator is looking for the statute I desire to say that I am very unwilling to repeal those clauses of the treaty and those laws which relate to transportation in bond through this country, because it is a very large business and a very great interest would be injured if it should be done. I am very willing to give notice of the termination of the fishery part of the treaty, and I do not know but that Article XXIX of the treaty would cover the transportation question. The question is whether the law which is here proposed to be repealed affects transportation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The twenty-ninth article of the treaty provides, not for the fishery subject or the transportation between the two countries of things in bond from the ports of one country to those of another, but it provides for complete transit from the sea, for instance at Portland to Quebec, and from Port Huron, in Michigan, to Buffalo, for another illustration, reciprocally. That is the twenty-ninth article.

Mr. WINDOM. Would that provide for transportation, for instance, through Minnesota, of goods brought and carried to Manitoba?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly it would; it covers all that thing. Article XXX would not provide for that.

Mr. WINDOM. But Article XXIX——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Article XXIX provides, I think, for that, because it says not only New York, Boston, and Portland, "but any other ports of the United States," and then reciprocally the other way in exactly the same terms, so that Article XXIX would cover things from Manitoba coming across the Territories of the United States for the British provinces; all that would come under Article XXIX. Article XXX is an entirely different thing, which provides really for the British having the benefit of the coasting trade of the United States, and the United States having the benefit of the coasting trade on the lakes. That is the sum and substance of it, stated briefly.

Mr. FRYE. No notice is given as to Article XXIX.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no. The only question is whether this repealing clause of the act of 1873 is to operate as repealing the provisions that have been made to carry out Article XXIX; but Article XXIX did not require any legislation about it; it executed itself. I will look now at the act of 1873, and see if it did provide for carrying out Article XXIX.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the Senator will find it did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be, but it was not necessary.

Mr. FRYE. Even if the Senator finds that it did, there is ample time to amend it at the next session of Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. Yes; but we would rather amend it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be arranged in a moment, if it is necessary. I do not think it is, for it says "relating to the fisheries;" but we can fix it in a word.

Mr. FRYE. I said to both Senators from Minnesota that it did not interfere at all with the rights and privileges which were of advantage to us under the treaty. I refer to the twenty-ninth article, which was not repealed, and not to the legislation which the resolution undertakes to repeal, for I did not have in my resolution any such reference to legislation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This is an express repeal of legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To guard against all possible misconstruction about it, I move to amend the amendment of the committee, page 3, after the end of the description of the title of the act, after "fisheries," partly in line 13 and partly in line 14, to insert:

"So far as it relates to the articles of said treaty so to be terminated."

So that we repeal the act only that far.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think that covers it.

Mr. WINDOM. I am sure it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCREARY (the hour of adjournment having arrived). I ask unanimous consent that the session of this evening be extended until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], can conclude his remarks, which was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will again refer to the fact that section 4347 was the only statute which put the treaty of 1871 into effect. Under that statute if the Canadian Government violated Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871, then the President was authorized by proclamation to declare what? That Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX, inclusive, should be abrogated, but not Article XXIX, as Article XXIX was supposed to go into effect and remain in effect forever, and I will show that the Republican Senate, under the dictation of New England Senators, intended it to remain forever. We are now dealing with 1883 and a Republican administration. What was to be done? Our people wanted the treaty of 1871 abrogated, not only Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX, inclusive, but Article XXIX, and everyone supposed the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate introduced the joint resolution to abrogate the whole treaty. But how did they abrogate it? The joint resolution was amended. I will show it was amended, as set forth in the debates of the Senate just read.

There were Republican Senators, as the debate shows, who feared the language as contained in the joint resolution might be construed to abrogate Article XXIX, and they called the attention of the distinguished Senator from Vermont to it, and he slips down, and in his quiet way says, what? "But we can fix it in a word. I move to insert, so far as it relates to the articles of said treaty so to be determined." What articles? Articles from XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, leaving Article XXIX in force, which is to-day practically the only article claimed to be in force, and the only article which the Republican Senators or the gentlemen on the other side of this House will say is not abrogated and can not be abrogated under two years' notice.

I have endeavored to show what Article XXIX was and its practical results upon the wage-workers and the industrial interests of the country.

In pursuance of the aforesaid joint resolution which became a law, President Arthur issued a proclamation abrogating Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX.

The proclamation put an end to the treaty of 1871, so far as the fishery question was concerned. It abrogated the treaty in that respect, and withdrew from Canadian bottoms the right to navigate Lake Michigan and to engage in our coastwise trade on the Lakes; but it did not affect Article XXIX.

Now, we come to 1877, and the bill brought into the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was chairman, known as the retaliation bill, of which I have endeavored to give a history in my preceding remarks. If you will carry your minds back to 1883, to the debate that has been read and the amendment that was proposed by the Senator from Vermont in the joint resolution, you can see that, from the beginning down without a deviation, he pursued the accomplishment of a studied and definite purpose.

When you come to the bill which he introduced into the Senate, remember that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 was then in full force and effect and his bill did not touch it. When the bill came over to the House and went to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that committee, taking a decidedly different view, reported a substitute; and when the bill came from the committee the House adopted an amendment empowering the President of the United States to do—what? Not only what the bill already empowered him to do, but also to exclude Canadian cars, [Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871]; and when the vote was taken on the disagreement between the two Houses every gentleman on the other side voted to agree with the Senate except one, as I have already shown. Why did they vote against it? They did not want Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 abrogated—high protectionists, all of them, in everything except our domestic railroad transportation. The bill went to the Senate, with the result which I have endeavored to explain, and then the distinguished Senator from Vermont came forward and, in his grandiloquent way, in his conference report in regard to the difference between the two Houses, said it would never do, oh no, it would never do to confer "this enormous power" upon the President to exclude from the United States a Canadian car!

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir. I can not be interrupted now.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman permit me a question? I have listened patiently to his argument and have not interrupted him in any way?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIND. I understand by the gentleman's argument, if I have followed it correctly, that he is undertaking to demonstrate that Senator EDMUNDS and the Republicans generally have been opposed to any repeal or abrogation of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty and of the legislation to carry it into effect. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. LIND. Does the gentleman now say that he and the Administration favor that?

Mr. SCOTT. I am not talking about that.

Mr. LIND. But I have a right to ask the question.

Mr. SCOTT. I am talking now about the record; and my vote shows my position in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. LIND. What is the gentleman's position?

Mr. SCOTT. As I go along I will explain that.

Mr. LIND. Well, the question is a categorical one which can be answered yes or no.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer it in two minutes.

Mr. LIND. All right.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House bill went to the Senate and was returned here, and what was the result?

Mr. DAVIS. The Democrats voted for it.

Mr. SCOTT. Hold on a minute. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman asked a question, and I answered it.

Mr. SCOTT. The issue was as I have stated it, and you, sir, evaded it and voted against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House; and yet you pretend to be the friend of the New England fisherman and the friend of the wage-worker of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAVIS. We ultimately voted together, as I understand.

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; we did not ultimately vote together. When that bill came back to the House, and the question was presented to the House, you and your Republican friends said: If we insist on giving the President the power to abrogate Article XXIX then we will get no bill; and the Democratic side of this House, or at least a portion of the Democrats—twelve in number—when it came to a question of the House receding from the amendment voted with you, and the bill as it originally came from the Senate became a law, as the best we could get.

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman permit me to make one statement here?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BELMONT. I want to recall the fact and have it in the RECORD that House conferees insisted to the end; they only yielded by instruction of the House, after a debate and a vote, in which all the Republican members of the House and a very small number of Democrats, 13 or 14, made up the majority against us.

Mr. SCOTT. Section 4347 Revised Statutes, to which I have referred, confers the power upon the President, if Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 was violated by Canada, to abrogate Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX, inclusive. It is an undoubted fact, sir, that Canada has violated Article XXVII, and I will endeavor to prove it. The underlying principle contained in Article XXVII was that American bottoms and American citizens should have the same right to use the Canadian canals upon the same terms that the Canadian subjects use them.

The House will bear in mind that Articles XXVII and XXIX are the only ones now in force practically relating to this subject. Article XXVII is as follows:

> The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States; in connection with which, see Revised Statutes, section 4347.

Under the provisions of this statute we conceded to Canadian bottoms the free use of the St. Clair Canal, a canal that alone makes it possible for vessels of heavy draught to pass from the waters of Lake Erie to the waters of Lake Huron; and also the free use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which alone makes it possible for any vessel to pass from the waters of Lake Huron to the waters of Lake Superior, where the Dominion of Canada possesses an inland seacoast fully equal to our own, and from which she would be excluded to-day except for this provision. What did we receive in return for this concession? The right to use the Canadian canals upon the same terms and conditions that Canadian subjects and Canadian bottoms use them.

The use of our canals is virtually free of cost to Canadian bottoms; but we were only to enjoy the privileges of Canadian canals upon the same terms and conditions that Canadian bottoms were permitted to use them. Now, let us see if this agreement has not been violated, at least in spirit if not in law, by the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government imposes a toll of 20 cents per ton upon vessels passing through what is known as the Welland Canal, extending from Port Colborne on Lake Erie to Port Dalhousie on Lake Ontario, and this is the only water connection available to American bottoms between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. This toll is therefore paid both by American and Canadian bottoms.

Let me call the attention of the House and the country to what I consider a violation of the treaty on the part of Canada, and I can not better illustrate it than to take three steam-ships loading in the city of Chicago with American produce for exportation to Europe. Two of them are American bottoms and one English. The English vessel is loaded with grain to be unloaded at Montreal. One of the American bottoms is also to be loaded with grain to be unloaded at Montreal, and the second American vessel is loaded with grain to be discharged at Oswego, on Lake Ontario, State of New York, for export to England via New York City. All three of these steam-ships have to pass through the Welland Canal. All three pay this toll of 20 cents per ton. But the Canadian ship and the American ship destined to Montreal and whose grain is to be exported from Montreal, on their return trip, when they present to the collector of the port at Port Dalhousie a receipt from the collector of the port of Montreal that their cargoes had been exported from Canada through Montreal, receive from said collector a rebate of 18 cents per ton, making the toll only 2 cents per ton through the Welland Canal, instead of 20 cents, to the American and Canadian steamers unloading at Montreal. But the American steamer whose cargo was consigned to Oswego, on presenting a certificate that the cargo was exported to England via Oswego and the city of New York, receives no such drawback. And this violation of the treaty on the part of Canada has been going on for years past, and in direct violation of its spirit and for the benefit of Canadian bottoms and Canadian ports.

If the notice served upon this Government by the Canadian Government in 1886 that the fish of American fishermen should no longer be exported in bond through Canada under Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 was not an abrogation of that article on their part, clearly the action of Canada in the matter I have just referred to is a violation of Article XXVII of said treaty.

Now, sir, I go to another point in this history. I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to lines 30 to 36, contained in bill No. 3173, reported to the Senate by Senator EDMUNDS from the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Forty-ninth Congress, and known as the retaliation bill. I quote:

> It shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States.

And also lines 44, 45, 46, and 47 of the same:

> And also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

Now, what does this language mean? Was it intended to entrap the President of the United States in the exercise of his high duty in protecting the honor and the interests of the United States? What construction can be put upon the words:

> It shall be lawful and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States or in his discretion.

Is this language mandatory? Or is it intended to confer discretionary powers upon the President? Or was it the intention to place the President in a position where, in certain events, whether he acted or did not act under the powers conferred, a Republican Senator could denounce him, and talk about impeachment? Did not the hand of a political assassin draught these sentences?

In House bill No. 10786, covering the same subject, introduced January 17, 1887, by Mr. BELMONT, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the language used, which conferred upon the President the same powers embraced in the bill of Mr. EDMUNDS, was as follows: "He," the President, "can by proclamation prohibit vessels," etc.; and as to what this means there is no ambiguity or uncertainty.

Is it not about time for the American people to inquire what are the powers, duties, and privileges of the American Senate, and whether, by its acts of commission or omission, it is not in fact arrogating to itself not only powers under the Constitution vested in the President of the United States, but in its co-ordinate branch, which represents the people?

Sir, thirty years ago, in the Senate, when questions relating to the relations between the co-ordinate branches of the Government were under discussion, what was the opinion of Mr. Benton upon this subject—as able a Senator as ever served in that body?

> If the President and Senate invade the legislative field of Congress, which is to judge, or who is to judge between them, or is each to judge for itself? The House of Representatives and the Senate in its legislative capacity, but especially the House, as the great constitutional depository of the legislative power, becomes its natural guardian and defender, and is entitled to deference in the event of a difference of opinion between the two branches of the Government.

Sir, in my humble efforts to discharge the duties of a Representative upon this floor I appear to be singled out, not only by gentlemen on the other side of this House, but also by Senators; and, sir, in coming to this subject I refer to the language which I have just quoted from Thomas H. Benton. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read the debates in the Senate of day before yesterday. It is not necessary to read it at length.

The Clerk read as follows the remarks of Senator TELLER:

Now, Mr. President, what is the condition of this bill and what are the circumstances under which it comes to us? Yesterday, as the Senate was proceeding with its business in the usual way, there came in a bill which I learn now has never seen a committee of any body, of either this House or of any other. It never ran the gantlet that every bill runs of criticism; it has never been printed. I do not know that I am at liberty to say who introduced it in the House of Representatives. I do not know how far I can go upon a question of that kind. I can state what I have seen in the public press, and I suppose I have a right to read what is in the RECORD, and if I have perhaps I have the right to say that this appears to have been introduced by a gentleman who is not a member of the committee that generally takes cognizance of these things, not only not a member of the committee, but I may say without offense to him, a gentleman that in no sense and under no circumstances has a right to speak for American labor.

Without going to a committee the bill goes through the House and comes here. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] said with great frankness that it was a political movement. I do not find in the RECORD that this bill was drawn in the solicitor's office, but I hear it outside. I hear that it was sent down from the executive department of the Government in hot haste to the House of Representatives to be passed. I do not know that that is so; I only say that that is the rumor, that is the report. I submit to the Senate, however, that it does not take very much to make one believe that in the quick passage of this bill through the House of Representatives there was something more than a desire to protect American labor against the incursions of Asiatic labor.

If I were to look over the whole House and select a man who would most fitly represent the American people who toil, I should hardly have thought of selecting the man who came hot haste with that bill and who succeeded in passing it through the House as very few men would have been able to do, and he succeeded only because he is a high priest in the Democratic church. It is a bill which could only have been considered by the unanimous consent of the House, the Speaker's recognition being first had. This occurred immediately on the reading and approval of the Journal. He succeeded only because he represents the President of the United States more than any other man in the Democratic party, as he did at St. Louis and as he does everywhere, and who is reported to have contributed ten times as much money to the campaign fund as his Democratic President has given. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know that so far as he is concerned if he chooses to give $100,000 to the Democratic campaign fund he has a right to do it. I hear that he is able to do it; that he has made his millions of money out of the laboring men of this country.

I may ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who is the special antagonist here of trusts, what he thinks of letting the Democratic House of Representatives be controlled and run by this great Democrat, who is conspicuous not for his great intellect, but for his great railroad interests, of which he boasts in the Congressional Directory.

During the reading of the above extract—

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think it is necessary to continue the reading. I will put in more of it if I desire to do so. I just wish to refer to that part of it which relates to myself as a Representative on this floor.

Mr. BRUMM. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he was going to print? If he does I will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General leave has been granted.

Mr. SCOTT. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Colorado in the Senate of the United States questions my right as a Representative of this House to introduce a bill. The Senator from Colorado, when he comes to talk, is for the exclusion of the Chinese; but when time and opportunity for action come, he deals in personal abuse.

Let us see, sir. The President of the United States submitted to the Senate a treaty with China. I am digressing a little from my subject, but I have got to do it—in which there was a provision prohibiting Chinese laborers coming into this country.

That treaty had already been practically agreed to, and China was ready to ratify it. It would have become a treaty obligation between the United States and China, but for what? The inertia of a Republican Senate! The treaty could have been ratified without delay, but the Senate attached to it amendments that did not materially affect any of the fundamental provisions, and after they had delayed its ratification one hundred and two days it was sent to China with the amendments proposed by the Senate. In the meantime the Chinese minister, with whom that treaty had been negotiated and who was also minister resident to the South American Republics, after having accepted the Senate amendments and supposing the treaty would be acceptable to China, left for South America and is absent there to-day. The treaty went to China and upon its receipt there back came telegrams from the Chinese Government wanting to know whether the Senate could put on any further amendments. There was no high official here to represent the Chinese Government. The Chinese minister was in South America.

At the time the treaty was agreed upon between the Secretary of State and the Chinese minister and submitted to the Senate, China was satisfied with the provisions contained in the same. I have no doubt the delay on the part of the Senate in ratifying it brought up new considerations in China, whether or not, if the treaty should be ratified as originally drawn, she might be compelled to confer the same privileges, under the favored nation clause, to the British colonies in the Pacific, and not only to them but to those of Germany and Spain, where her people had been drifting in and out for centuries; and this delay on the part of the Senate brought about, evidently, a whole reconsideration by China of the questions contained in the treaty. If the treaty is rejected by China, the dilatory action of the Senate is responsible.

The gentleman asks what right had I to introduce such a bill. I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have an extract read from yesterday's Post.

The Clerk read as follows.

A FLOOD OF CHINESE LABOR.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, September 4.

During the past week five hundred and eighty-four Chinese arrived at Vancouver, B. C., from China. It is evident their destination is the United States. An officer of the Dominion Government just returned from British Columbia, stated that there is a steady stream of Chinese floating around that province into Washington Territory. In this way during the present year it is estimated the Chinese population of British Columbia has already been depleted to the extent of five thousand. The minister of customs, who is now on the Pacific coast investigating the Chinese question, has promised to look into the matter for the United States authorities.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the answer to the Senator from Colorado as to the necessity and urgency of action by this House to immediately put a stop to the coming in of this Chinese labor; and, sir, this Democratic House did not require three days to find out whether they would pass that bill or not; it was passed in thirty minutes. The distinguished walking Representative on this floor [Mr. BRUMM] also wants to know why I introduced that anti-Chinese bill. He has been here, sir, as the professed friend of labor, but has he introduced any bill in the interest of the wage-worker or the laborer? The distinguished Senator from Colorado said, as the RECORD will show, that I as a representative of labor had neither the right nor the brains to introduce such a bill. Well, sir, what difference does it make whether I had the brains or not? The question was as to the bill itself. Did it accomplish what the Senator from Colorado professed to favor? If it did why did he not accept it without referring to me in the personal manner in which he did? He might at least paid me a compliment instead of saying that I was neither a friend of labor nor did I have the brains to introduce a bill.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a point of order. I will raise the point of order that the reference to a Senator is out of order, unless my colleague will agree that whatever is said here shall go into the RECORD and be printed in his remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. I will put in everything that I say. That is what you object to.

Mr. BRUMM. O, no; I simply want the whole thing to go in. I do not want the gentleman to make remarks here on the floor, and then leave them out of his speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]?

Mr. BRUMM. I withdraw the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKALEW. Nobody has seen it yet.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I will only say one word in regard to the treaty which has lately been rejected by the Senate. The Administration requires no defense from me, sir; but I challenge any man to find a just and reasonable complaint by an American fisherman against Canadian administration of unjust treatment since 1886, for which the treaty lately rejected did not provide a remedy and a safeguard for exigencies that may arise in the future. In the published records of the two years that have elapsed since the abrogation, on June 30, 1886, of the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871, there is not a recorded case for which the treaty lately rejected by the Senate did not provide and fully cover.

I dislike very much to exhaust the patience of the House, but, sir, the charge against this Administration is what? That it is not maintaining the honor and dignity of the nation in our relations with foreign powers. This suggests a retrospect of the Democratic party and a comparison of its management of our foreign relations with that of the old Whig party, which was the residuary legatee of the Blue Light Federal party of New England, who, whenever their country needed their services, were always to be found in opposition to it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the Whig party went out of existence the Republican party became the residuary legatee not only of the Whig party but also of the Federalist party of New England. But in justice to the Whig party, I might ask how the Republican platform of 1888 on the tariff would strike Henry Clay, the father of protection, if he were alive to-day? The gentlemen on the other side of the House and in the Senate are asking us to catch the British lion by the tail and to shake him. Well, we are ready to shake him when there is any necessity for it, but let us see how they ever shook the British lion. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I go back, sir, to the years 1836 and 1837, when Martin Van Buren was President of the United States. In 1837 there was a little disturbance in Canada in the way of a rebellion, attended with some bloodshed. An American steamer called the Caroline was engaged in the transportation of passengers and freight from Schlosser, on the American side of the Niagara River, to Canada. The insurgents were encamped on the Canadian side, and as this American steamer was engaged in transporting provisions the British authorities decided to destroy her. So a detachment of their soldiers, or Canadian militia, crossed the river at night and burned the Caroline. Mr. Van Buren's term was drawing to a close. Mr. Fox was at that time the British minister here. Immediately Mr. Forsyth, our Secretary of State under Mr. Van Buren, addressed a communication to Mr. Fox, in which he said in substance: "In these disturbances on our frontier we have kept faith with you; we have prevented our people from going there and joining the rebels against you. Under what authority, then, have you permitted your soldiers to cross the line and destroy an American steamer?"

When the reply of the British Government was received they would not admit that the soldiers who had destroyed the Caroline were British soldiers or that they were responsible for it. More than that, "they carefully abstained from indirect or implied assumption by withholding pensions to their wounded officers in that affair, one of whom had five severe wounds," and for a period of three years they never assumed the destruction of the Caroline.

In 1841 Mr. Van Buren's term of office expired and he was succeeded by the Harrison and Tyler administration. On the 8th of February, 1841, this subject was again taken up by the British Parliament, and in the course of it Lord Palmerston admitted that the Government approved of the burning of the Caroline. But a man by the name of Alexander McLeod, a Scotchman, who had boasted that he was one of the men who assisted in burning the Caroline and that he had shot down two of our citizens, happened to come over within the jurisdiction of the State of New York and was there arrested.

Lord Palmerston soon knew whom he had to deal with. He knew there was no longer a Democratic administration of the Government of the United States; and in an official communication he boldly demanded the release of McCloud. Mr. Webster was Secretary of State. What was the result? McLeod was acquitted by the courts of the State of New York; but at the time he was surrendered Lord Palmerston had admitted in his debates in Parliament that the British Government was responsible for the destruction of the Caroline. But no demand was ever made by our Government for redress.

We now come to the treaty of 1842, the treaty to finally settle our northwestern boundary. The plenipotentiary on the part of England was Lord Ashburton, and Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, on our part. As Mr. Benton says:

> Sixty years had elapsed since the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain which had established the boundaries between the revolted colonies, now the independent States, and the remaining British possessions in North America. Part of these boundaries agreed upon in the treaty had not been acknowledged by Great Britain. It was that part which divided the State of Maine from Lower Canada, and was fixed by the words of the treaty along the high lands which divided the waters which emptied themselves into the St. Lawrence and those which fell into the Atlantic Ocean. Nothing could be more simple or easy of ascertainment than this line. But by the treaty of 1842, referred to, we abandoned every claim to this line and virtually surrendeder the whole territory in dispute to Canada, about three hundred miles.

We now come down to the treaty of 1846 between Great Britain and the United States.* Mr. Polk was President. The Democratic party in the campaign, resulting in the election of Mr. Polk, as will more fully appear by referring to the platform of the party, made the issue upon two great questions, the annexation of Texas and the line of 54° 40′ as the boundary between the British possessions and the United States on our northwestern frontier.

Prior to 1801 the French owned Louisiana, and their boundary line extended up to the Lake of the Woods in the neighborhood of what is known as Winnipeg. How was this boundary line described then as between France and Great Britain? From the Lake of the Woods on the forty-ninth parallel westward indefinitely. In 1803, under Mr. Jefferson's administration, we acquired Louisiana.

It is true that under the administration of Mr. Polk we did not get what was the battle-cry of our party, namely, 54°, 40′. But we did get the forty-ninth parallel, beginning at the Lake of the Woods, extending due west to the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of the channel of Fuca Straits to the Pacific Ocean. Had this line of the forty-ninth parrallel continued on to the Pacific Ocean on the shores of Vancouver's Island it would have given us a portion of that island; and if we surrendered any territory at all under the treaty of 1846 it was a portion of Vancouver's Island. But when I recall the fact that every acquisition of territory made by this Government since it was established, namely, the acquisition of Florida, Louisiana, Texas, California, and New Mexico, was under Democratic administrations, enlarging the area of the United States, I think, fully 100 per cent., if not more, of what it was at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and that the only acquisitions made under other administrations has been that of the Gadsden purchase during Mr. Pierce's administration, and Alaska, under the adminstration of Mr. Johnson, I think the record of the Democratic party will compare favorably with that of any other party during our existence as a nation in defending our national honor and interest. It will not be improper to refer to the fact, sir, that no sooner had we acquired Alaska, for which we paid $7,000,000 to Russia, that the only industry out of which the people of this country could have realized any material benefit, the sealing fisheries, were at once farmed out as a monopoly by a Republican administration conferring exclusive privileges, and unquestionably the parties who secured these privileges have realized nearly as much profit from it as the entire sum which we paid Russia for Alaska.

In conclusion, I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country to the clause of the Constitution of the United States, referring to the powers conferred upon the President and the Senate in regard to treaties. Section 2, clause 2:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

This language confers upon the Senate a greater power than is conferred upon the President. The Senate can advise, and two-thirds present must concur. The word "advice" has been construed literally to mean the power to amend; the Senate has exercised this privilege of amending treaties submitted by the President, and which they exercised in the case of the Chinese treaty, now pending between the two countries, and which, it is reported, has been rejected by China, growing out of the Senate amendments.

Was any proposition made by the Republican majority of the Senate to amend the treaty with Great Britain submitted by the President and lately rejected by them? The Republican Senators had the power to amend, but the treaty was rejected in the Senate by a strict party vote, every Democratic Senator voting to consent and every Republican Senator voting to reject; and under what conditions did the Republican Senators reject this treaty, or refuse to amend, placing the President in a position where he could not renew negotiations, in an effort to settle peaceably the questions in dispute between the two countries?

The bill No. 3173, introduced by Senator EDMUNDS, is now a law upon the statute-books, and if the language in the same can be construed literally and is not formal, that "it shall be his duty," what other construction could possibly be put by Great Britain upon the two combined—that is, the rejection of the treaty and the powers conferred upon the President—than a menace on our part and notice to them that further negotiation was neither desired nor would be entertained? Have the Republican Senators, I would ask, discharged their constitutional obligations, or have they not?

Mr. LIND. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to answer my question.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer it: You get the Republican Senate to abrogate Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, and I pledge myself to vote for it.

A MEMBER. It has passed the Senate already.

Another MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. LIND. The question I asked was this, or rather I made this statement: I understood the gentleman in the course of his argument to say that the Republican Senate and the Republican party generally had upheld the twenty-ninth article and legislation for interchange of traffic in transit under and in pursuance of it. Then I ask the gentleman whether he and the Administration was against that legislation and against that course of conduct?

Mr. SCOTT. The records of the Forty-ninth Congress show where the Administration and where the Democratic party stood. My vote and their votes in the Forty-ninth Congress show that.

Mr. LIND. The gentleman declines to answer my question.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCCREARY (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

CAMPAIGN WORK BY A SENATE EMPLOYÉ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no resolutions, concurrent or other, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution submitted by Mr. VEST, September 3, 1888, in relation to campaign work by a Senate employé.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have no disposition to detain the Senate in regard to the resolution——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to suggest to the President of the Senate whether under the unanimous consent given last evening the Chinese restriction bill does not come up now, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is morning business.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the resolution be laid aside temporarily until after 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the resolution be informally laid aside.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR, as follows:

Resolved, That the attention of the President be respectfully called to the resolution of the Senate adopted August 28, ultimo, requesting him to communicate to the Senate copies of all communications addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating against certain unfair treatment of our citizens, and that he be requested to furnish such information as soon as possible in order that it may be considered in acting upon legislation now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VEST. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, although I have no direct information myself, for I have not seen the President and can not speak for him, that he allow the resolution to go over at least for this morning and take it up during the day. I understand that the President intends to make a communication to the Senate inside of half or three quarters of an hour upon this subject. If it meets the approbation of the Senator from Massachusetts I hope that course will be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that the resolution, retaining its place, may go over to be called up later in the day. Of course, if the information desired comes in the resolution will be unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri suggests that the resolution be passed over informally until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I did not so understand. I understood the Senator from Missouri to suggest that it be passed over informally so that it might be taken up later in the day if the Senate should then desire to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie over, to be taken up at a later hour.

Mr. VEST. Yes, that is what I suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. PLATT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the Chinese restriction bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, in justice to myself I wish to make a statement in reply to an observation by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] made two days ago. In a speech which I delivered in the Senate some ten days or two weeks ago I made a statement, upon information received from the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], to the effect that in 1881 seven Chinamen were naturalized in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., where General Harrison, the Republican candidate for the Presidency, resides, and that those Chinamen voted the Republican ticket at the ensuing election in the fall.

I further stated upon the same information, upon which I fully relied and which I have no doubt was given honestly and with the understanding on the part of that Senator that it was absolutely correct, that Mr. Miller, the law partner of General Harrison, had superintended the taking out of the naturalization papers by those Chinamen. I mentioned this fact not as any personal or partisan attack upon General Harrison, with whom I have served in the Senate and from whom I differ as widely as it is possible upon all political questions, but to whom I would not do any injustice; but I mentioned it in connection with his votes upon the subject of the naturalization of Chinamen in the discussion and action of the Senate in 1882. It had been stated very broadly in the Senate that no Chinamen had ever been naturalized, when the facts are that some twenty had been naturalized by State courts and had been allowed to vote, in Connecticut, in Massachusetts, and in Indiana.

I stated at that time that I intended to write to the city of Indianapolis and procure the record showing the absolute facts in regard to that statement. I have not the official record—the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] tells me that he has it—but I have from a friend, who states that he was having the record prepared, a statement made after a personal examination of the record by himself, which he has sent to me for my use. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has the official record which has come since.

Mr. VOORHEES. Here it is. I intended to hand it to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I was mistaken as to dates, but only as to dates. I stated, and I correct myself as to the former statement, that this naturalization took place in 1876. I made that statement in reply to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. I find from this letter (I have not examined the official record, but I shall offer that also) that these naturalizations took place in 1880 and 1881. I will read what my informant says, who is a private gentleman of absolute verity within my personal knowledge, and for whose statement I am responsible. He says:

In 1881, when General Harrison was elected to the United States Senate, Mr. Vincent Carter, a lawyer, was a Republican candidate for the Legislature, and he was mainly instrumental in having seven Chinamen naturalized in the city of Indianapolis. The list is as follows:

Name.	Arrived.	Naturalized.
Shang Foy Sung Moy	May, 1873	Feb. 7, 1880
Chang Sing	1872	June 13, 1881
Foo Chang	1872	Nov. 2, 1880
Black Sing Pang	Aug., 1872	Sept. 6, 1880
Jo Qui Sing	Apr., 1870	Sept. 6, 1880
Chan Yee	June, 1873	Jan. 22, 1880
Pang Yin	Apr. 15, 1875	Oct. 12, 1880

This is taken from the records of the clerk's office, book A, entitled "Declaration of Intentions." The fee-book shows that nothing was charged for issuing the certificates, although the usual fee was $2 for each certificate.

Dan. Ransdell, esq., whose name is signed to the papers given these Chinamen, was then clerk of the Marion court. He was then, as he is now, the close friend of General Harrison, and is the Republican State central committeeman from Harrison's district. These Chinamen voted the Republican ticket at the fall election of 1880 in wards 11 and 17 of Indianapolis, although their votes were challenged by the Democrats.

If this needs any corroboration, I ask the Secretary to read the affidavits made by two gentlemen now in the city of Washington, one of them the legal adviser or attorney for the Post-Office Department, the other also holding an official position, but I do not know his rank.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, District of Columbia:

Joseph W. Nichol, a citizen of the city of Indianapolis and State of Indiana, being duly sworn, deposes and says that at one of the elections held in said city and State during the year 1880 (it was at the October or November election of said year) he was present at the polls on Massachusetts avenue, in said city, in the Eleventh ward, and at the engine-house in said ward, as a challenger for the Democratic party, and that at one of said elections two Chinamen were presented at the said polling place by one George Carter, a lawyer and a Republican, with Republican ballots in their hands, which said Carter asked for them, they not being able to speak the English language with facility, that they be allowed to deposit said ballots and vote the Republican ticket; that as the first Chinaman presented his ballot he, affiant, protested against receiving the same on the ground that said Chinaman was not a citizen, and that then and there the said Chinaman and said George Carter produced and exhibited to the election officers a certificate of declaration of intention on the part of said Chinaman to become a citizen of the State of Indiana and of the United States, and thereupon the said election officers or the inspector of said election at said precinct received said vote and deposited it in the ballot-box in presence of said affiant and others, and thereupon the vote of the second Chinaman was presented and received by the inspector and deposited in the ballot box.

Affiant says that at said election Daniel M. Ransdell, a Republican, was clerk of the superior and circuit courts of the county of Marion, in which said city of Indianapolis is situate, and said certificates were issued by him, said Ransdell, as he, affiant, was informed at the time; that he, affiant, did not critically examine said certificate at the time, but was assured by said election officers that they were correct and in the usual form; and further affiant saith not.

Joseph W. Nichol, above-named affiant, being duly sworn, says the above and foregoing is true as he verily believes.

J. W. NICHOL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of August, 1888.
[SEAL.] THOS. E. ROACH,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, District of Columbia, ss:

Before me, Thomas E. Roach, a notary public in and for said city and District, this day personally came Austin H. Brown, a citizen of the city of Indianapolis and State of Indiana, temporarily residing in the city of Washington, who, being duly sworn according to law, says that prior to the year 1887 he was a continuous resident of the city of Indianapolis for thirty-seven years; that in the year 1880, at an election held in said city, he was selected and did act as the challenger for the Democratic party organization at the precinct of the Seventeenth ward; that the voting place of said precinct was on South street, between Meridian and Pennsylvania streets, in said city; that during the voting hours on said election day there was brought to the election poll aforesaid by the Republican workers a Chinaman, who presented a Republican ticket to the election inspector, Benjamin F. Hetherington, a Republican; that immediately the said Brown, as challenger, challenged the right of said Chinaman to vote, whereupon he took from his pocket and produced an official paper, with the seal of the Marion County court attached, and signed by Daniel M. Ransdell, clerk of the court, a Republican, certifying that the said Chinaman had taken the oath of allegiance to this country and had declared his intention of becoming a citizen thereof; that notwithstanding this the said Brown persisted in his challenge, on the ground that no court or court officer had any right to issue such a paper to a native of China. The inspector, however, declared that it was prima facie evidence sufficient to permit the holder of the certificate to vote, and he then deposited the ballot in the ballot-box. This same Chinaman was the owner of a laundry in said city, and shortly after this occurrence changed the sign over the entrance to his place of business by adding after his name the word "citizen."

AUSTIN H. BROWN.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 20th day of August, 1888.
[SEAL.] THOS. E. ROACH, Notary Public.

Mr. VEST. The record certified by the clerk, which I have just examined hastily, it seems is a certificate as to six papers of naturalization, possibly seven, but as I read it now six. Anyhow, I ask the Secretary to read that paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF INDIANA, Marion County, sct:

I, John E. Sullivan, clerk of the Marion circuit court, within and for said county and State, the same being a court of record, do hereby certify that in the year 1880 the following-named persons declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, to wit:

Chang Fay Sung Moy.
Sing Jo Qui.
Sing Pang Back.
Yim Pong.
Chan Yee.
Chan Foo.

That such declarations of intention, as aforesaid, were all made before Daniel M. Ransdell, then clerk of said Marion circuit court, and that each of said persons, so as aforesaid declaring his intention, made affidavit that he was a native of China, and owed allegiance to the Emperor of that country; a true and correct copy of the declaration of intention made by the said Chan Foo being the one bearing the latest date, to wit, November 2, 1880, is hereto attached marked "Exhibit A," and made a part of this certificate, the same being similar in form to all the other declarations so made, as aforesaid, by said parties named.

All of which appears from the record of declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States, for the year 1880, on file in my office.

Witness my hand and seal of said court at Indianapolis, Ind., August 20, 1888.
[SEAL.] JOHN E. SULLIVAN, Clerk, etc.

Mr. VEST. I do not know that this is a matter of any considerable importance, but in view of the statement made by certain partisan newspapers, especially in the State of Indiana, to the effect that I had garbled and falsified this record, I did not choose to rest under the imputation. I made the statement upon information derived, as I said, from one of the Senators from Indiana and from members of the House of Representatives from that State, and I undertook to secure that record. It seems that it has been in the possession of my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], but it only came to me whilst I was making these remarks. It is for the purpose simply of removing any sort of suspicion that I would do General Harrison injustice, much as I differ from him, that I now offer this proof.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I understood him before to state that these Chinamen were naturalized. This certificate relates entirely to a declaration of intention to become citizens.

Mr. VEST. I am glad that the Senator has called my attention to that. The term "naturalization" is used. As a matter of course we know as lawyers that it was not naturalization, but it occurs in that State as in a great many of the States that a declaration of intention is a sufficient basis for exercising suffrage.

Mr. DOLPH. That declaration is made simply before a clerk without any other party, voluntarily on the part of the person making it.

Mr. VEST. That is true.

Mr. DOLPH. Naturalization, however, requires action by a court.

Mr. VEST. The Senator and myself are lawyers, and I understand that; but when the declaration of intention is used for the purpose of exercising the right of suffrage, it is generally denominated, incorrectly it may be, as a naturalization paper. Of one thing there can be no sort of question——

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I understood the Senator also to state in his speech some days since that the partner of General Harrison had appeared in the court and made the motion. Does the Senator now find any basis for that statement?

Mr. VEST. I intended to state, and thought I had stated, that that information came to me from one of the Senators from Indiana, and I made it upon his statement. Since then I have seen the dispatch from Mr. Miller, in fact from both the law partners of General Harrison, disclaiming that fact, and of course I do not think——

Mr. DOLPH. There is nothing in the record the Senator now produces upon that question?

Mr. VEST. Nothing. My friend who writes me states that the Republican candidate for the Legislature superintended this operation before the clerk of the court.

Mr. DOLPH. But there is nothing in the record which shows that there was any proceeding which required any counsel.

Mr. VEST. I do not know that there is except that the Chinamen were taken there.

Mr. DOLPH. Or that General Harrison or any of his partners were cognizant of it?

Mr. VEST. Except that these Chinamen were taken there and the certificates given to them as to their intention to become citizens, and that they afterwards appeared in two wards of the city of Indianapolis and cast their votes for the Republican ticket against the challenges of Democrats.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to interrupt him?

[At this point a message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator ought to state, if he will permit me to interrupt him, in order to give it deeper significance, that this occurred in the city and State in which General Harrison lived.

Mr. VEST. I think I shall attend to my own occupation, with due respect to the Senator from Kansas. Knowing how good a friend he is to my party, for myself politically I receive his suggestions with a good deal of distrust. But if it is any gratification to him I will say that I have already stated that. This suggestion is about as significant as his reading a partisan editorial yesterday in which no man of even extraordinary intelligence was able to discriminate between the text of the reporter and the commentaries of the Senator, both of them, as a matter of course, coming from friends of the President, the Senator from Kansas and the correspondent of the New York Tribune, and both of them illustrating the extraordinary influence of the President of the United States, who, as the Senator from Kansas said, sent a message with a sign manual of his kitchen cabinet upon it, but of so potential an influence that not a single Republican in either branch of Congress dared to vote against the bill, and the Senator from Kansas himself voted in favor of the bill which he says is an Administration measure. As a matter of course if he voted for it it was right, and yet the whole burden of his complaint was that it came from the President of the United States.

I ask that the message which has just come in from the President be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In reply to the resolution of the Senate in the words following:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, September 5, 1888.

"Resolved, That the President is requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate whether the recent treaty with China and the amendments adopted by the Senate have been ratified by the Emperor of China"—

I have to communicate the annexed copies of dispatches from our Minister to China, giving the only official information at hand in relation to the matter to which reference is had.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, since this bill has been before the Senate there has been a tacit understanding among the Senators from the Pacific coast that they would not occupy the time of the Senate and thus delay action by speech-making. For this reason most of the time which has been occupied in the discussion of this bill since it came to the Senate has been occupied by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. It was agreed, moreover, by unanimous consent, in the Senate yesterday, that at 1 o'clock to-day the vote should be taken on the passage of the bill; consequently there remain but a very few minutes' time in which any member of the Senate on this side of the Chamber can have the privilege of making any suggestions in regard to this measure. I propose to occupy the attention of the Senate, through its courtesy, these few moments.

It has been said upon the part of Republicans in the Senate and elsewhere that this is an Administration measure. If it is, then I am heartily with the Administration. I am earnestly and decidedly in favor of the pending bill, as I believe the Senators are generally on this side of the Chamber, if not unanimously. But the suggestion has been made on the other side of the Chamber on this floor, and also elsewhere, that this is not an Administration measure. If it is not an Administration measure, if this bill were not introduced in the House of Representatives at a wink or a nod from the White House, and the Administration is against it, then I am not with the Administration on this measure. I am for the bill, however, irrespective of the question as to how it came here or the question as to the motives which prompted its coming. I am for it because I believe it to be a most important step in the right direction. I believe it to be a most decided step, although not as long a step as I should have taken had I had my way in reference to the matter, in favor of the absolute exclusion of Chinese laborers from within the limits of the United States of America.

The bill, as I suggested yesterday and as we all know, simply relates to those Chinese persons now in the United States or who have been within the United States heretofore. It provides that so far as they are concerned, if they shall go away, or if any of them have gone away heretofore, they shall not be permitted to return.

That is this bill. That is all there is of it. It is important, radical; but radical as it is, I, inasmuch as by this step we abrogate a most material provision of our existing treaty with China, would have gone one step further and made the prohibition, the absolute exclusion, apply, not only to those Chinese who are in the United States now, or who have been in the United States at some time heretofore, but also to the 400,000,000 Chinese who never have been in the United States.

In this connection, as I had not the opportunity fully yesterday, I desire to refer to a remark made more than once in this Chamber by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], in which he has questioned the sincerity not only of a great number of the people of the Pacific coast, but in which he has taken especial and particular pains to question my sincerity in reference to the position they occupy and I have occupied in regard to the subject of Chinese exclusion.

As I stated yesterday, by way of interruption, I am willing that my record on this subject shall stand side by side with the record of the Senator from Alabama, and side by side with the record of every Democrat on the other side of the Chamber and every Democrat in the House of Representatives or in the United States. Three years ago next December I introduced a bill in this body providing for the absolute exclusion of Chinese from the United States; a bill which applied not merely to Chinese here, and who might go away or had gone and wish to return, but to the millions now in Asia. The second section of that bill read as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese person or persons, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise, as well those who are now within the limits of the United States, and who may hereafter leave the United States and attempt to return, as those who have never been here, or, having been here, have departed from the United States (save and excepting only the following classes, that is to say: Such as may be duly accredited to the Government of the United States as ministers plenipotentiary or other diplomatic representatives, consuls-general, consular and commercial agents, including other officers of the Chinese or other Governments traveling upon the business of that Government, with their body and household servants), to come to or within, or to land at, or remain in any port or place within the United States; and the coming of Chinese persons to the United States, excepting the classes hereinbefore specifically described and excepted, from and after the passage of this act, be, and the same is hereby, absolutely prohibited.

At the present session of Congress, in December last, I reintroduced that same bill. I supported it in a speech three years ago, and again by another last January.

That bill, which was an absolute exclusion bill, received the studied and persistent and continued opposition of the honorable Senator from Alabama in the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I am a little surprised at the attitude of the Senator from Alabama now, in his speech yesterday in advocacy of a bill which, according to his own statement on the floor of the Senate, is an absolute abrogation of certain material provisions of existing treaties between this Government and China; especially when the records of the Senate and the records of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which he is a member, will show that always heretofore he has persistently, in season and out of season, insisted that the Congress of the United States should pass no bill that would impinge or infringe in the slightest degree on any provision of our treaties with China. That is the record of the Senator from Alabama; and my own record, the sincerity of which he has questioned, I have in part alluded to. I am willing they shall be paralleled and stand together.

Now, Mr. President, if this is an Administration measure, as suggested in certain quarters, then I want to point out what a most wonderful conversion there has been in Administration circles upon this great subject within the past two or three years, yea, within the past two or three months. When the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] was speaking the other day I rose and inquired if he was aware that the present President of the United States and the present candidate of the Democracy for the succeeding Presidency had on the 6th day of April, 1886, sent a message to the Congress of the United States in which he had recommended that the Congress so change the existing Chinese restriction laws, the act of 1882 as amended by the act of 1884, as to admit into this country a large class of Chinese persons who were not permitted to come here under existing law, the existing restriction acts. The Senator from Mississippi replied that he was astounded at the statement, and that he did not believe the President of the United States had ever sent any such message here.

Mr. President, he did. I hold it in my hand; and if I have the time I shall read it. That message, moreover, was accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, in which he recommended the same thing; and, based upon the letter of the Secretary of State, the President communicated his message to the Congress of the United States asking for this change in the existing law.

Now, what was the change he asked to have made? I will say to Senators on the other side I am not going to misrepresent the President; I am not going to misrepresent the Secretary of State; and especially am I going to be careful about my statements as to facts when I know that before the vote is taken to-day on the final passage of this bill the Senators on the other side will not have an opportunity to reply, although they will have ample opportunity hereafter if they shall desire.

With these preliminary statements, what are the facts? Under the restriction acts as they now stand, the act of 1882 and the amendatory act of 1884, it was provided that certain evidence certificates should be produced at ports in this country by those Chinese persons who were not prohibited from coming to the United States by the Chinese treaty and the restriction acts, such as teachers, students, merchants, and those coming from curiosity. Those were the only classes that were excluded from the prohibitory clauses of existing legislation including those of the treaty. They were permitted to come. When the Congress of the United States, therefore, came to legislate in reference to this treaty, it was provided that all persons coming from the ports of China should produce a certificate issued by the Chinese Government or under its authority in which certain things should be stated, such as the name, title, or official rank, if any; the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation, and place of residence, etc.

The existing legislation provided, in the second place, that Chinese persons not of the prohibited but of the exempted class, who came from other ports in other foreign governments than China, and who were at the time not subjects of China, but were subjects of such other foreign government, should bring a similar certificate issued by such government. The existing legislation, however, did not provide that subjects of China who proposed to come to this country from other ports than the ports of China should be permitted to come. That class, by existing legislation, was and is ruled out.

Now, what followed? In the first place, the Treasury Department took action on the matter. The first attempt, I admit, was made under a Republican administration. The first circular was issued by Mr. McCulloch while he was Secretary of the Treasury. It provided that Chinese persons who were subjects of China and not subjects of some foreign power, and who desired to start to this country from a port other than a Chinese port, should be attested or certified to by the diplomatic or United States consular officer at that port. Of course that was in contravention of law.

This Administration undertook to carry out that circular, and because Colonel Mosby, who was then our consul at the British port of Hong-Kong, in China, would not carry out the instructions of this Treasury Department circular upon that subject, he was removed from office by Secretary Bayard and by the President of the United States, and Mr. Withers, a former member of the Senate from Virginia, was appointed his successor at that port. A renewal of instructions proceeded from Mr. Bayard and from the Department of State instructing Mr. Withers, as the United States consul, to issue certificates to Chinese subjects of the exempted class who desired to depart from the port of Hong-Kong to the United States, and under those instructions Mr. Withers did proceed to issue hundreds and perhaps thousands of certificates, as I am informed, and under which a class of Chinese subjects whose immigration to this country was prohibited by existing law were permitted to enter the port of San Francisco.

After a time the President of the United States and Mr. Bayard awoke to the fact that this circular of the Treasury Department which they were attempting to enforce and which they had modified in July, 1885, was in direct violation of law, was not warranted by the restriction acts; and what did they do? Then it was that the President of the United States sent to Congress the message of April 6, 1886, to which I have referred, which I hold in my hand, and in which he suggested to the Congress that, by existing law, a large and numerous class of Chinese persons were not permitted to come to this country which he thought ought to be permitted to come under the treaty. Congress had construed that treaty, and had legislated in view of the provisions of the treaty intelligently, as I believe. Congress, in its wisdom in construing the treaty in the passage of two restriction acts, had decided that this class which the President of the United States and Mr. Bayard afterwards wished to have come in under an amendment of the law, were not entitled to come in. At all events, Congress had legislated in the act of May 6, 1882, and the amendatory act of July 5, 1884, in such a manner as to prohibit their coming.

What does the President say in that message? It is contained in an executive document, by the way, and I will give its number, so that Senators can find it. It is Executive Document No. 118, first session Forty-ninth Congress. In that message President Cleveland says this, among other things; I wish I had time to read it all:

There being, therefore, no statutory provision prescribing the terms upon which Chinese persons resident in foreign countries, but not subjects or citizens of such countries, may prove their status and rights as members of the exempted classes in the absence of a Chinese representative in such country, the Secretary of the Treasury, in whom the execution of the act of July 5, 1884, was vested, undertook to remedy the omission by directing the revenue officers to recognize as lawful certificates those issued in favor of Chinese subjects by the Chinese consular and diplomatic officers at the foreign port of departure, when visaed by the United States representative thereat. This appears to be a just application of the spirit of the law, although enlarging its letter, and in adopting this rule he was controlled by the authority of high judicial decisions as to what evidence is necessary to establish the fact that an individual Chinaman belongs to the exempted class.

Then he concludes his message:

This anomalous feature of the act should be reformed.

He recommends an amendment of the existing legislation—

as speedily as possible, in order that the occurrence of such cases may be avoided and the imputation removed which would otherwise rest upon the good faith of the United States in the execution of their solemn treaty engagements.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 6, 1886.

So that on April 6, 1886, we find the present President of the United States so careful of having the treaty stipulations between this Government and China observed that he sends a message to the Congress of the United States recommending a change in the existing law so as to conform to his notions of the provisions of the treaty, so as to permit the coming to this country of hundreds and thousands of Chinese who were not permitted to come under existing law. There has a sudden, a most wonderful change come over the Administration, if this is an Administration bill; more wonderful, indeed, than that which happened to Saul of Tarsus, who was stricken down on his way to Damascus.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will permit me. He says the Secretary of State——

Mr. MITCHELL. If it is a short question I will yield.

Mr. GRAY. I will make it short. The Secretary of State was so anxious to have treaty stipulations complied with, which they ought to be, as all Christian and civilized people agree; so I want to remind the Senator and call his attention to the fact that he negotiated an additional treaty which for the first time by treaty stipulation and treaty provision excluded Chinese in a way they had never been excluded before, and accomplished every result which is accomplished by this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is no answer at all to what I have been saying; it has no relevancy; it does not bear on the question at all. I have made the statement that the present President of the United States, President Cleveland—and I hold the proof in my hand—recommended a change in the existing Chinese restriction law in 1886. His message of April 6, 1886, recommended that that law should be changed so that a large class, a "somewhat numerous class," as he says, that are prohibited under existing law may be permitted to come here. He says:

It is sufficient that I should call the earnest attention of Congress to the circumstance that the statute—makes no provision whatever for the somewhat numerous class of Chinese persons who, retaining their Chinese subjection in some countries other than China, desire to come from such countries to the United States.

That is the existing statute—

"The somewhat numerous class" which he thought were entitled to come under the treaty, or ought to be permitted to come, were not permitted to come under the existing law, and therefore he sends in this message recommending a change in the law so that they might come, and that is all there is of it. In reference to the last treaty I will simply say as a measure of exclusion it is, in my judgment, and would so prove, an absolute failure. I will say, furthermore, to the Senator, that it never was negotiated, although the administration was in power for years, until the Republican Senate passed a resolution at the instance of the Senator from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, suggesting that negotiation be opened with the Chinese Government for that purpose.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Oregon is wrong in his statement. It was negotiated long before.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will say the record, I think, shows quite differently.

But furthermore, and I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that in the Chinese bill the Senate passed here some days ago—within the last month, I think it was—and which has been passed by the House, and which is now unsigned before the President of the United States so far as the Congress is advised, the Democratic House of Representatives put on an amendment by which they repealed the clause in the existing law on the subject of naturalization; that is, the clause prohibiting the naturalization of Chinese persons.

Now, one word—and I exceedingly regret I am so limited for time—in reference to General Harrison's record. A studied attempt has been made all along the line to charge upon the Republican candidate for the Presidency that his record on the Chinese question has been inimical to the true interests of this country and has not been right; and reference has been made to the vote on the bill of 1884. They said he was absent; that he did not vote. That is true, but there is not one word in that record from beginning to end which shows that General Harrison opposed that bill, while there is abundance in his record to show that he was earnestly in favor of as strong a restrictive act as the treaty would warrant. But not only that, if that is to be taken as a reason why he was opposed to the act of 1884—that is, that he was absent—I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there were eleven Democrats of this Senate absent at the roll-call, and who were not paired and who did not vote on that bill, including the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who made the speech here the other day charging General Harrison with dodging votes; and my esteemed friend, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], who has spoken earnestly against the pending bill, voted against the bill, according to the RECORD.

I will read the names of the Democrats who were not present and who in company with General Harrison did not happen to be here to vote on that bill, that is the Chinese restriction act of 1884. They were Messrs. Camden, COLQUITT, GEORGE, Jackson, Jonas, KENNA, Lamar, McPHERSON, SAULSBURY, Walker, and Williams; 11 Democrats who were absent, and 8 Republicans were absent. Now, can it be said that because these 11 Democrats happened to be absent and did not vote for that bill, they were opposed to Chinese restriction? They stand in the same position precisely as General Harrison—in so far as that act is concerned. I regret my time is exhausted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, in the consideration of this measure——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Do I understand the President to say that debate is not in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. Unanimous consent having been given yesterday that at 1 o'clock to-day the vote should be taken without debate, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to suggest to the Chair that the distinct understanding was that the agreement was only binding on Senators who were then present. That was the agreement.

Mr. VEST. That was the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate desires that the order shall be revoked or reconsidered or not regarded, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Oregon to continue his observations.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon was stopped by the Chair upon the understanding the Chair had that the vote was to be taken at 1 o'clock without further debate. If that is incorrect, the Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to recall the recollection of the Chair and the Senator from Arkansas. There was a vote taken and no quorum disclosed. Afterward there was a call of the Senate and a quorum was disclosed. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] then said in the first place that this understanding would be binding only on the Senators present, forgetting for the moment that there had been a call of the Senate, which disclosed the presence of a quorum. I suggested to him myself that the call had disclosed a quorum, and the Senator thereupon announced that in his judgment it would be binding upon the Senate, and that was the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to Senators that it would be better, to avoid any misunderstanding, to have the RECORD read; and the Secretary will read the part of the RECORD of to-day containing the proceedings of yesterday regarding the agreement to take the vote at 1 o'clock to-day.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEWART. I ask the unanimous consent of those present that a vote be taken on the bill immediately after the morning business to-morrow, without debate so far as those who are here are concerned.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. TELLER. Say 1 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock, without debate so far as those present are concerned. We can not bind those who are not present.

Mr. TELLER. There is a quorum here.

Mr. STEWART. As there is a quorum here I will ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that to-morrow at 1 o'clock the vote shall be taken on the question shall the bill pass, without further debate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and——

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Nevada propose that the vote shall be taken to-morrow without any debate at all?

Mr. STEWART. The debate can go on previous to 1 o'clock. I propose that the vote shall be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. The debate will be previous to 1 o'clock.

Mr. VEST. When will the bill be taken up?

Mr. STEWART. It will be taken up immediately after the morning business.

Mr. TELLER. If the time to vote is fixed at 1 o'clock, we should take up the bill earlier than that hour if anybody wishes to speak on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear suggestions from any Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the bill be taken up in the morning immediately after the disposition of the routine morning business.

Mr. TELLER. And that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then again state the request of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that unanimous consent had been given to that request. The Chair so announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before it had been formally agreed upon the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] interposed a suggestion that some debate ought to be permitted, and the Senator from Nevada then modified his suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed the Chair had announced the first suggestion as agreed to; but if the Chair understood it otherwise it is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion now is that unanimous consent be given to the consideration of the bill at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow, and that the vote on the question, Shall the bill pass? be taken at 1 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. I happened not to be in the Senate yesterday, and therefore was not aware of the proceedings that had been had. I will not violate any understanding of the Senate notwithstanding; as I understand it, it does not bind me or any other Senator who happened to be absent.

I desired to say a word or two on the motion I am about to make, or which I may make hereafter; but I now move that this bill and the message of the President which has just been read to the Senate be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

Mr. TELLER. That is contrary to the arrangement. It is out of order to do anything but vote on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that the motion to commit is in order under the rules, notwithstanding the agreement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I sincerely hope that the motion will be adopted.

Mr. TELLER. The question is whether we shall not vote. That was the agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to commit the bill, with the message of the President of the United States, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.]

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALTHALL (when the name of Mr. GEORGE was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is detained at home by sickness. I think he is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. My colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. I was not aware of that, and withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his vote.

Mr. WALTHALL. My colleage would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. BLAIR. I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I have a pair on all political questions with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. I have been assured repeatedly that he was in favor of the passage of this bill. Unless some one on the Democratic side will say that this question has assumed a political phase, I shall vote. If it has assumed a political phase, then I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. GRAY. I think the Senator is quite at liberty to vote in that view of the case. There is no political question in it.

Mr. TELLER. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is also absent. I do not know how either Senator would vote on this motion. I simply announce the pair.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not observe the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT] here. He is paired with my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. MORGAN (after having voted in the negative). I am informed by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that he is not aware of the attitude his colleague [Mr. EVARTS] would occupy on this motion. Being paired with him it is my duty to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his vote.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire to be understood as expressing any opinion as to how my colleague [Mr. EVARTS] would vote if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 19; as follows:

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to ask a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLAIR. It may be too late to raise such a point, and perhaps there is no such point, but I desire to ask whether pending the roll-call on the passage of the bill it is in order to move to commit it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to advise the Senate positively on that point, as the suggestion has been made once before, the Chair will have the clause of the rule read, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Rule XV.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XV, clause 2.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

2. When a bill or resolution shall have been ordered to be read a third time, it shall not be in order to propose amendments, unless by unanimous consent, but it shall be in order at any time before the passage of any bill or resolution to move its commitment; and when the bill or resolution shall again be reported from the committee, it shall be placed on the Calendar, and when again considered by the Senate it shall be as in Committee of the Whole.

Several SENATORS. Call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. BATE (when Mr. BECK's name was called). The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I have been, as I stated before, paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. I have the consent of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to transfer the pair of the Senator from Louisiana to my colleague [Mr. BOWEN], so that I feel at liberty on this question to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I announce again that I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I should like to transfer the pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee is paired with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. That arrangement will permit the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to vote, if he so desires.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to transferring the pair, and the Senator can vote.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce again that my colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is absent on account of sickness and is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea;" but he not being present, I shall not vote.

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. My colleague would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" on the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] and myself, who are paired, I suppose I would vote the same way.

Mr. WALTHALL. My colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. Then I am privileged to vote.

Mr. WALTHALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I have voted.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I ask the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] if he wishes to continue the arrangement transferring our pairs as before.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. Not knowing how he would vote I refrain from voting. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. Referring to his colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] I suppose I have the right to vote on this question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no doubt my colleague would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. MORGAN. I vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but understanding that he would vote "yea," if here, I vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON (when Mr. QUAY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. QUAY] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. GRAY (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent, paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but believing that he would vote "yea," if present, I will vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON. Understanding that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] if present would vote "yea," I desire to cast my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] having announced that his colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY], with whom I am paired, would vote "yea," if he were present, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRAY. Both the Senators from West Virginia are absent. I am authorized to state that they would vote "yea," if present. I do not know with whom the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is paired, but if his pair refrained from voting he is at liberty to vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. GRAY. I do not know with whom the other Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired.

Mr. CULLOM. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce the fact that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Kentucky is necessarily absent, as I understand is also the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Kentucky, if not paired, would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. Being assured that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] with whom I am paired would vote "yea," I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. My colleague would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], but understanding that if he were present he would vote "yea," I record my vote "yea."

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, is a motion to reconsider in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to make that motion, and if it shall prevail to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk. A reconsideration is necessary to place this bill in such a condition that it may be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has not yielded the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment be read. I send the amendment to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. This act shall not take effect until the expiration of sixty days after its passage unless the pending treaty between China and the United States be rejected by China within that time, but shall take effect immediately upon such rejection, and this act shall take effect upon the expiration of sixty days after its passage, provided said treaty shall not within that time have been ratified. If within sixty days from the passage of this act said treaty shall have been ratified by China, then this act shall be void.

Mr. BLAIR. I submit that motion.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield the floor?

Mr. TELLER. I thought he had yielded the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. No, sir; I simply say this, that we have kept our agreement. We have voted as we agreed to vote and passed the bill. Now, I yield the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, a few moments since I made a motion to commit this bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Although not present yesterday, I would not violate the understanding of the Senate by saying what I desired at that time, but I think I am in order now.

Mr. STEWART. The motion to lay upon the table is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table has not yet been submitted.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood the Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did.

Mr. GORMAN. So that I beg to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Maryland, and the motion to reconsider is debatable.

Mr. TELLER. I would insist on my motion—I addressed the Chair before anybody else—but as that would have the effect to cut off the Senator from Maryland I will not urge it now; otherwise I should insist on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not suppose the Senator from Colorado desired to cut off debate.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly not; otherwise I would insist on the motion.

Mr. STEWART. I understood the motion was made. I made the objection under a mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Colorado to make the motion. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. I think the whole Senate can appreciate the fact that the Senator from Nevada wishes to prevent everybody else from debating this measure.

Mr. President, I made the motion to refer because of the message that was read to the Senate to-day, and because of the hasty consideration of this measure, coming here as it did, I have no doubt, under a misapprehension.

Mr. PLUMB. Created by whom, will the Senator state?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Kansas will pardon me. He can have the floor later on.

There could not be any question about it; everybody understands it, that when this measure was considered here and elsewhere up to this hour, there was a belief that the treaty which had been negotiated had not been ratified by the Chinese Government, but had been rejected. Now officially it comes to the Senate to-day that that information was not correct and that the Chinese Government had not considered this treaty, and it came in response to a resolution of the Senate.

There has never been a measure looking to the exclusion of these people from our country that I have not voted for since I have been a member of this body. In thorough sympathy with all who desire to exclude them, I made the motion, because I believe that the Senate owes it to itself and to the country, while the treaty is pending, and we are now officially informed of that fact, that such action as we have just taken ought not to have been taken with any country, not even with the small powers south of us, and if it were a great power, as has been said by Senators on this floor, I doubt if it could have received half a dozen votes. It ought to have been fully considered by a committee of the Senate. We all understand on both sides the pressure here in the face of a great contest between two great parties, which has prevented that fair consideration.

I concur with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], a leader on his side, that this matter is above politics, above the Presidential election, and it ought not to have been considered in this indecent haste, now that we have this official information that the Senate has asked for. I should have voted for the bill, as I have announced, but for my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], when the matter came directly to our consideration, but owing to the pair I could not vote on it.

I am delighted that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has made the motion that he has and offered the amendment that he has. It only demonstrates that we have acted in great haste. It is a matter that should have been considered by an intelligent committee of this body, in the light of the information that the President has given us, and I trust that the Senate will now, after it has had time to reflect on it, vote to reconsider the motion by which the bill passed and let it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, an intelligent committee of this body, made up of distinguished gentlemen of both parties, who will give it that fair consideration and fair dealing to which the subject is entitled.

I have no doubt the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire has been well considered by him, but it is too important a question to be voted upon now in the Senate, and I give notice, and ask my friend from New Hampshire to co-operate with me if his motion to reconsider is carried, that I shall then again move that this matter be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the message of the President and with the amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire has offered, so that that committee may come here to-morrow or next week and present us a measure that is fair and proper, that will not violate our treaty obligations, or put us in such a position that the Chinese Government will have the right, the moral right, and be justified in the eyes of the world, in excluding all our people from their shores.

We must look ahead, Mr. President. From what we gather from the newspapers of the condition of affairs between China and other great powers, the greater part of the trade of that continent may be ready within the next six months to be transferred to us. If the signs of the times are correct, this may be the opportunity of all others that we have sought for in the last forty years, to obtain possession of that trade by only doing that which is fair and right and manly. As a Democrat I do not believe that either party can gain any great advantage by this unseemly and hasty action on a great measure that is away above politics. We are all united in restricting this immigration and keeping it from our shores. I do not believe in this contest there is any advantage on either side. But if we go on in the face of the information coming here in response to a resolution of the Senate showing that the treaty is pending, and now for Congress to pass this act in such haste, doing that which has never been done in the history of this country, and which no other civilized nation would think of doing, and that, too, which may make it impossible for this great nation of sixty millions of people to have the benefit of the trade with China, and make it impossible to sell their manufactures to that people, you may close the door which we sent our Navy and diplomat to open.

Mr. President, by these hasty and ill-considered measures we may retard and jeopardize the business interests, and woe to the party and to the man who, for a temporary advantage in an election, will violate the great principles which ought to govern the actions of nations and thereby make it impossible for us to extend our commercial facilities. It will be a sad day for the country. The Senator from Nevada ought to restrain his impatience. His people are harassed by these Chinese, I know, for I have witnessed it. Undesirable and bad as it may be, we have no right to strike such a blow pending the consideration of the treaty. The treaty as it came to this body effectually excluded further immigration. The Senate amendments, not material, caused the delay, but for that the question would have been satisfactorily settled.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the more I read the dispatches accompanying the message, the more I feel that this legislation is justifiable and proper, even if it had not been inaugurated by the House of Representatives. The first dispatch reads as follows:

PEKING, September 5, 1888.

BAYARD, Washington:

Believe treaty has been rejected. Have demanded from foreign office positive information some days since. No information has yet been received.

DENBY.

The second is:

PEKING, September 6, 1888.

That was yesterday—

BAYARD, Secretary, Washington:

Treaty postponed for further deliberation.

DENBY.

I say the bill is justifiable after all the delays that have been had, after all the procrastination that the people of the Pacific coast have been subjected to, in view of the fact that thousands of Chinese are coming in there fraudulently daily, and when there is a clamor for the impeachment of our judges because they are compelled under existing laws to admit Chinese. These Chinese have become so troublesome and such a nuisance that they are destroying the very existence of society, and are coming in by thousands. It was understood when this treaty was ratified by the Senate that the amendments to it were entirely agreeable to the Chinese minister, and it was claimed on all hands that these amendments did not change the original treaty as understood by the State Department. It was understood then that the object was to put a stop to the immigration, and the amendments do nothing more. It was argued here, and with much force, that the original treaty allowed as stringent regulations and as stringent legislation as the treaty with the amendments; but, as I explained before, after the experience the Pacific coast people have had on this subject, they wanted it specific, and it was made specific and certain according to the intent and meaning as it was declared to be and understood to be by the Senate on both sides of the Chamber and by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Four months have expired and we now first hear that the treaty is rejected altogether, but no information is given upon that demand. Days elapse, and finally when they get word in this direction, they say, "We will keep it under consideration, postpone it." It is no time for them to postpone. We have tried for the last fifteen years to exclude the Chinese by negotiation, and we have been thwarted at every point. They are coming now and invading our country by thousands, and I say it is no time for them to postpone. We shall never get what we want by negotiation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Besides, if the Senator will allow me in that connection, it has been stated over and over again by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that the Chinese minister had plenary power.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly he had plenary power; he was satisfied with the amendments, and now it has gone on four months, and the Pacific coast has been worse invaded in those four months than during any other like period of time in the history of the country, and the Chinese Government have postponed the treaty for further deliberation.

I say the time for deliberation has passed. Let us pass this bill. The President has another bill before him. If the Chinese Government propose to act, let them act at once; but if you postpone this bill; if you do not pass this bill, Congress will adjourn soon and it will be postponed, and this will go on for another year, and there will be no help for it. Any man who will go to San Francisco and see the pest that is in the heart of that city; learn the facts of the disease that is spreading through the community; learn the terrible habits of these people; the opium curse which is debasing the white youth and destroying the life-blood of that city, will not hesitate to take all necessary measures to stop this evil. In addition, the coming of these Chinamen is supplanting white labor.

I say it is the duty of the Senate to pass this bill and stop this ulcer, that is destroying one of the finest cities in the Republic, besides spreading all over the country and spreading demoralization everywhere. We can not wait, and this deliberation is an insult, after their minister here has expressed his satisfaction with these amendments. It shows that the original treaty was but a trick and intended to be evaded. There are conditions in the treaty which are unnecessary and will make a great deal of trouble, allowing a Chinaman to return to this country who has a family here or has a thousand dollars' worth of property, or where there is somebody who owes him a thousand dollars. There is no such case as that. That is a sham, a device, a trick to enable them to come in, as they could under that treaty, under former constructions, by parol evidence, because the courts have held they might introduce parol evidence. That treaty was manifestly intended by them to be evaded.

We have passed a law here which we thought would tend to block that and answer every purpose. Great care was exercised in devising that law so as to keep within the former treaty. I do not know whether it has done so or not. I think it very doubtful; but even with that, we find the Chinese Government postponing it, and sending their people here by the thousands. It is not good faith, and it is the duty, I say, of the Senate to pass this bill and stop this evil now.

There is no use of talking about the past. There is no use in raking up records. If you do not pass this bill, this will go on for another year. This question will never down; you never can get rid of it until you take affirmative, strong action. The Chinese Government have had plenty of time to ratify this treaty if they intended to ratify it; but they have no intention of signing any treaty if they can avoid it. They have no intention of making any arrangement with us which their cunning can not avoid. The action must come from us, if this country would protect its own citizens. China must know this, and I hope this bill will not be reconsidered, but that the motion to reconsider will be voted down, and the bill go to the President as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] in his zeal should not confuse the issue. This bill is not operative in any such direction as his remarks would indicate. To pass it or not to pass it does not help much or hurt much.

Mr. STEWART. Why not?

Mr. BLAIR. I am just about to tell why not. This bill relates only to Chinamen who have been here and have gone back to China and have got certificates. This bill provides practically for the nullification of those certificates. It does not embrace the great, broad question whether other Chinamen shall come to this country at all or not.

While this bill was under discussion and these friends of ours from the Pacific coast were dealing in their trivialties about the passage of this bill I urged the Senator from Oregon to offer an amendment to it, providing that unless this treaty was ratified within a reasonable time this law itself should provide for the absolute exclusion of all Chinese immigrants.

Mr. STEWART. Let me call the attention of the Senator to one fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The existing law provides that no Chinamen that have never been here shall come.

Mr. MITCHELL. No laborer.

Mr. STEWART. No Chinese laborer.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the existing treaty?

Mr. STEWART. The existing law.

Mr. BLAIR. And the treaty has been made in accordance with that law?

Mr. STEWART. That law is in existence, and has been in existence for five years, that none shall come that have not been here before. The trouble is that all swear that they have been here before. This bill provides that none shall come whether they have been here or not, and consequently it closes the door for the next five years, and I do not believe we shall open it. So it is effective if we have it.

Mr. BLAIR. That is, by virtue of some law that exists. The Senator has that remedy. If this bill is as the Senator from Oregon explained, it is applicable only to those who have certificates.

Mr. MITCHELL. It applies to all Chinese persons who have ever been in this country and who are not here now.

Mr. STEWART. Let me explain to the Senator from New Hampshire. The treaty of 1880 provided that legislation might be had limiting immigration. No act was passed to enforce that provision until 1882. In 1882 an act was passed. It was then said to be unfair to exclude those who had left the country between the making of the treaty and the passage of the act—about two years. So the act provided that they might come in on proof of previous residence. It provided, also, for certificates for any of the rest who might go to China and wish to return.

Now there is a stream of previous residents—thousands of them—that have been coming in, and the courts have been overloaded by cases involving their identification. All swear that they are "previous residents," and it has been impossible to detect them.

I have been in the court-room when these cases have been up, and have seen a young Chinaman cross-examined by the attorney for an hour without avail. The young man would state where he had been in this country and where he had lived, and all the circumstances, so minutely and positively that the counsel could not disprove it.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEWART. One moment. Nobody could disprove it, although everybody knew to a moral certainty that the young man had never been here before. Occasionally there would be found a memorandum in Chinese in his possession, in which he had been given the directions. The memory of these people is extraordinary. They will learn a tale so well that through an interpreter you can not investigate it.

The courts in California have been loaded down with cases involving this question of previous residence, and they can do nothing with them. The people of the Pacific coast have become so disgusted with the whole thing that they have asked for its stoppage. These people get all sorts of certificates and papers and bring them to this country. Our people can not tell these Chinamen apart; hence all this trouble.

This bill fills the gap. It says that none shall come, and when you say that none shall come you cover the whole case.

Mr. BLAIR. But this bill does not say that none shall come. It only nullifies the certificates.

Mr. TELLER. The other bill provides that none shall come. The two together make the case complete.

Mr. STEWART. The two together; yes.

Mr. BLAIR. The two together, I understand, make it complete. Of course the Senator understands that the amendment which I have suggested in no event whatever can interfere more than simply to effect a delay of sixty days before the act shall go into operation; but if there should be during those sixty days a ratification of the treaty this bill would be void. I have from the beginning gone upon the theory that there is no treaty, that the treaty has been rejected, and this discussion upon both sides has gone on that theory. I do not suppose that anybody in the Senate would think of passing this bill except upon the ground that the treaty which we have been trying to get amended had been rejected by the Chinese Government.

That question of fact is in doubt. It would seem from the message of the President received this morning that the rejection has not yet taken place. The Senator from Nevada says that the non-action is one of the attempted fraudulent delays on the part of the Chinese Government. This amendment will render that attempted fraud, if it be such, entirely futile at the expiration of sixty days.

If that government is proceeding in good faith to a rejection and the treaty is rejected at any time within sixty days, then, by reason of this amendment, the law which it is proposed here now to pass becomes operative. But if within sixty days the Chinese Government proceeds to ratify the treaty, and ratifies it, this act becomes void, and the treaty which we have authorized on our part, and our consent to which as yet there has been no attempt whatever to revoke (and I suppose we could revoke it before China on her part accepts it), unless its provisions contravene the existing law, will afford all the remedy which the Senate has designed to give.

I call the attention of the Senate to the precise operation and effect of this amendment, which is simply to delay for sixty days' time the operation of the bill if we make it a law. It seems to me that unless this be a covert attempt, which I should dislike exceedingly to suspect, on the part of anybody to destroy the provisions of the treaty which we have agreed to enter into, unless that be the real purpose behind the zealous movement to secure the enactment of this bill, the delay for sixty days ought to be satisfactory to everybody. It is with that view that I offer the amendment, the Senate having received the message of the President this morning which we called for, and having learned that the President and the friends of the President in the other House have allowed us to proceed here from day to day in this matter under a wrong supposition as to the action of the Administration, and having learned that China has acted, so far as we know, in good faith. This treaty came to us in December and we deliberated about it until last May, so that China has not taken so very long a time on her part to consider it.

Mr. TELLER. It did not come in December. The Senator is very much mistaken. It did not come until very much later. It did not come here until spring.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall not be particular about the matter of the exact time. China has had it, at any rate, for about four months. The suggestion that her minister plenipotentiary could act without the home Government seems to be contradicted by the fact that the home Government has the treaty and is considering it in China.

The question seems to have arisen as to whether there are full powers in the minister, as to whether these amendments could be acted upon by the minister without consultation with his own Government. He may have been unauthorized to act upon amendments of importance. And even if he had the right to act upon them, and he had doubt about the wisdom or propriety of the amendments from the point of view of his Government, he had a right to consult his Government. Two months' delay will not seriously affect anybody, because by this specific bill the entry of Chinese on the Pacific coast or across the line upon the borders of Canada or of Mexico is prohibited.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that as matter of good faith we ought to reconsider our action on this bill and amend it in such way as I have indicated.

I do not assent to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], whom I do not now see in his seat, that it being reconsidered action should be taken to send the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think that would be trifling and juggling with the Senate. The proper time to refer this bill to a committee was when it came to us from the House. That was the usual and ordinary course of procedure; but the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee did not see that it was the proper thing to do. He assumed that the House of Representatives had the precise information which it now appears that nobody whatever in the Capitol at Washington possessed.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], not now in his seat, did enter a motion to refer, but, under the quiet, conniving, and acute manipulation of his associates on this side of the Chamber, as it appeared to me, he was gradually induced to withdraw from the motion which the impulses of his intellect and of his heart inclined him to make—the motion to refer this bill to the committee.

Accordingly the Senate proceeded to consider the merits of the bill, and it was considered long and thoroughly. Three days ago we reached the point of the passage of the bill, and it failed for the want of a quorum. We discussed it further, and again last night we reached the point of the passage of the bill, and it failed for the want of a quorum.

The merits of the bill are well understood, and there is no occasion for a consideration of it by the committee now. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and Senators on both sides of the Chamber, have expressed their views upon this bill and upon its merits. What further remains to be done, Mr. President? The opinion of the Senate undoubtedly is matured. There is just this one question, as to whether we are doing an act of bad faith and of insult toward China by making it operative at once. That is the only source of doubt, I think, that can arise in the minds of Senators.

I am not willing, sir, to proceed to do an act needlessly and improperly offensive to the Chinese Government. We have set them a precedent for burning our citizens in China, and I believe we have not yet paid them the cash for that precedent.

I think that this great country, this great Christian power as it calls itself, which assumes to set the highest and best example for mankind and calls on listening angels even to look down and see the highly civilized, refined, enlightened, and elevated Christian manner in which we transact business here on this earthly ball, may delay the operation of this bill two months for the sake of saving its reputation in this regard. That is why, after having kept my word as others kept their word, after having voted on this bill and voted in favor of the passage of this bill, I now offer this amendment. That is why I have thought that I ought to enter this motion to reconsider. But no one must understand if this motion to reconsider prevails and a motion to take the bill back to a second reading should prevail, that my vote would be recorded to send this bill to a committee. I am in favor of considering and ending the consideration of the bill by the Senate at the present time.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] appeals to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to have patience. Patience is a desirable virtue, Mr. President, but there is a time when it ceases to be a virtue, and it seems to me that it comes pretty late, after what has occurred in this Chamber within the last two or three weeks, for such an appeal to come from that side of the Chamber.

It was not long since that during the discussion of the fisheries treaty the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] took the floor, and in an elaborate prepared speech made an attack on the record of a certain gentleman who is now prominent before the country, and among other things stated that in the State of Indiana at a given time, at a time when the gentleman to whom I refer, an ex-member of this body, and now the candidate on the Republican ticket for President, was running for governor of the State, a number of Chinamen had been naturalized upon a motion made in court by the partner of this gentleman, and that they afterward voted for him at the election, as I recollect the Senator's statement. That was intended to be a serious charge. It was calculated to do harm. It went over the entire Union as coming from the Senator from Missouri, as information derived from a Senator from that State, a member of this body.

To-day it appears, when the record is produced, that instead of any Chinamen having been naturalized in the State of Indiana, some Chinamen went before the clerk of a court of record and declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. That is all there is of it.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that any foreigner may at any time declare his intention to become a citizen of the United States. I do not believe any clerk of any court of record has any authority to pass on the question as to whether he is or is not entitled to naturalization. It is not a judicial act in any sense. The Revised Statutes of the United States provide as follows:

SEC. 2165. An alien may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States in the following manner, and not otherwise:

First. He shall declare on oath, before a circuit or district court of the United States, or a district or supreme court of the Territories, or a court of record of any of the States having common-law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk, two years at least prior to his admission, that it is bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States.

[Be it enacted, etc., That the declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, required by section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may be made by an alien before the clerk of any of the courts named in said section 2165; and all such declarations heretofore made before any such clerk are hereby declared as legal and valid as if made before one of the courts named in said section.]

So I undertake to say that at the time of this declaration there was no provision for a judicial inquiry, and there can not be one, into the right of an alien making a declaration as to his intention to become a citizen of the United States. I think it is the duty of a clerk of a court, who acts in a mere clerical capacity, to receive the declaration and make the necessary record of it. The question what value it will have thereafter is settled by the law, and is to be determined by the court. This, I say, is all that appears in the statement that certain Chinamen had been naturalized in the State of Indiana.

There is no provision for the appearance of counsel in such a proceeding as that. There is nothing for counsel to do, and I understand there is nothing in the record to show that there was any counsel. And the Senator himself does not declare to-day that there was any counsel, much less any one connected with General Harrison.

Some affidavits taken in Washington have been read here from a party or parties in the employ of some of the Departments of the Government, as I understand, to the effect that one of the Chinamen offered his vote and that it was received. Suppose that was so, how does that affect the question of political parties in Indiana or in the United States on the question of Chinese naturalization? If that was so, it was the fault of the laws of Indiana, and I think they are very loose laws in that regard.

The statute of Indiana, approved April 21, 1881, provides, among other things, as follows:

SEC. 3. All elections shall be free and equal, and in all elections every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in the State during the six months, and in the township sixty days, and in the ward or precinct thirty days immediately preceding such election, and every male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and shall have resided in this State during the six months, and in the township sixty days, and in the ward or precinct thirty days immediately preceding such election, and shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote in the township or precinct where he may reside.

Until I read that statute, I was not aware that any State in the Union allowed a foreigner to vote immediately after his declaration of intention to become a citizen.

Mr. VEST. Several States do that.

Mr. DOLPH. If such a foreigner voted at any election in Indiana, I say that the fault was in the law of the State at the time referred to.

On Monday morning last, Mr. President, when I came into this Chamber, I learned that the House of Representatives had already passed this bill which had been introduced that very morning into the House to restrict Chinese immigration. As is well known, it came into this Chamber within two hours after our session commenced. Rumor is at fault, the press of the country is at fault, we are all at fault, or the bill was brought directly from the Chief Executive of this nation to the House of Representatives when it was introduced there. It is now claimed that some information has been received by the Government on the question whether the treaty recently negotiated between the Chinese Government and the United States has been ratified or rejected by the Chinese Government.

On Saturday I went to the State Department to get some information in regard to that matter, having read the telegram from London, and I was informed that there was no information before the Department upon the subject, that the telegram was not credited, and that it was believed that if the treaty had been rejected the American minister would have cabled that information to the Department. Notwithstanding that, this bill, as I have said, came from this high source, and, it was understood, with the approval of the Chief Executive. It was rushed through the House and sent to the Senate.

The telegrams referred to here do not appear to have been received, the first one until two days after that bill passed the House of Representatives, and was sent here for the consideration of the Senate.

Was it desired that the Senate should take the same course on this bill that the House had taken? I ask, was it desired by the author of this bill and by the Administration and by the party responsible for its passage through the House, that it should take the same course in the Senate that it had taken in the House? I am constrained to believe that it was not.

When the bill came into the Senate and was read the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] requested that the bill should be taken up for immediate consideration. The bill was read. The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] having the floor, the following proceedings occurred:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. The bill has not been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. STEWART. It has not; but I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that it was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives this morning, and it is rather urgent. The House understands what they are doing, and I hope the Senator will not make any objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. As I caught the reading of the bill, there is one question in it that I should like to have settled.

I will not read all the statement then made by that Senator. Omitting a portion, the proceedings continue:

I should like to have that matter considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations before I vote upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi make a motion that the bill be referred?

Mr. GEORGE. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations if there is objection made to its present consideration.

Mr. DOLPH. That is done on the objection of the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a House bill which has been read twice, and the Senator from Mississippi desires to have it referred.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] asked unanimous consent that the bill be taken up for present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] asks that it be referred.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Mississippi objects to the present consideration of the bill.

After some remarks by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL], the debate continued as follows:

Mr. GEORGE. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations for their consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Mississippi then objects to the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill would naturally go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Unless unanimous consent is given to consider it now, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VEST. I do not understand that the Senator from Mississippi objects to its present consideration. We can determine afterwards what we shall do with it.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to make a statement about it. I have stated my objection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair first put the question. The bill having been read twice, the Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that it be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I desire to say that I think it would be proper to have that point considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. If no other Senator agrees with me, of course I shall not make the motion to refer.

Mr. VEST. That is unquestionably the meaning of the bill. I am ready to vote for it myself. I believe in no sort of temporizing or half-way measures on this question. The Government of the United States ought to take a firm position and stand by it. Let these people come here, or else exclude them. If the present system of certificates and the return of Chinamen which follows it is to obtain, let us know it. For one, I am ready to vote for the bill.

As is well known, this bill led to a discussion in the Senate. The whole tone of that discussion was a complaint against the Republican side of the Chamber because they did not go against this bill or favor its reference to a committee or in some other way signify their dissent from it. The bill was criticised, but with the exception of the Senator from Mississippi, in the discussion which I have read, no Senator on the other side of the Chamber proposed a reference. The complaint was against the Republican side of the Chamber that they did not oppose the bill, and the effort was to make it appear that they were always, and were then, the only Simon-pure friends of restricting Chinese immigration.

Well, sir, that bill has been discussed from day to day until this time, and to-day what do we see? We see that entire side of the Chamber changing front and seeking now to postpone and prevent the passage of this bill. I will not say "prevent;" I will retract that, but I say to postpone the consideration of this bill and refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and voting almost solidly for that proposition.

What has come over the spirit of their dream? Has the situation changed? Not at all. The situation is precisely as it was on Monday morning last when this bill was sent down in hot haste to be introduced into the House of Representatives. If this bill is wrong in any particular, if it is a violation of any existing treaty, if it is premature, let those who originated the bill, and who are responsible for sending it to this body, take the balance of responsibility with regard to it and deal with it.

It was stated this morning by my colleague that before the pending treaty was negotiated the Senate had passed a resolution requesting the Administration to negotiate a treaty with China for this purpose. That was denied by the Senator from Delaware. I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the Senate on the 1st of March, 1888, on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That, in view of the difficulties and embarrassments that have attended the regulation of the immigration of Chinese laborers to the United States under the limitations of our treaties with China, the President of the United States be requested to negotiate a treaty with the Emperor of China containing a provision that no Chinese laborer shall enter the United States.

It was not until the 16th of March following that the treaty was transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, and I am able to state upon the very best of authority that about the time that resolution was reported, although there had been some negotiation between the State Department and the Chinese Government some time before, there had been nothing since about the 1st of the preceding May done in regard to that. So I reassert and repeat what was stated by my colleague this morning, that the treaty was not negotiated until after the Senate had passed the resolution which I hold in my hand.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say that I was present with the Senator at the interview of which he speaks with the Secretary of State. I beg leave to say that my memory is entirely at variance with that of the Senator as to the statement he makes now, and that that treaty had been negotiated practically and agreed upon before the time that this committee went there and saw him and before that resolution was passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I am very glad that the Senator from Alabama has opened the door. I shall feel at liberty to make some remarks in regard to that interview. I did not state that I learned that there. I said I had the very best authority for making that statement.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DOLPH. I do.

Mr. GRAY. I do not wish to take it from the mouth of the Senator from Alabama, but the Senator from Oregon the other day, or some one for him, opened that door himself by stating what transpired at that very interview.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not.

Mr. GRAY. Either the Senator from Oregon or the chairman of the subcommittee or the Senator from Ohio opened that door by stating what occurred at that interview.

Mr. DOLPH. I will say that what purported to be a statement of that very interview was telegraphed to the State of California to a newspaper not belonging to the political party with which I affiliate—a distorted statement, made in a complaining way as on the part of the Senate and on the part of the committee, and was afterward published in the newspapers of my own State. The statement did not come from me, and I do not believe it came from any member of that committee.

Now, I reassert that as I understood it at the time, and I think the recollection of the Senator from Alabama is at fault, there had not been for ten months any negotiations whatever between the Chinese Government and the Government of the United States. The Senator will recollect what occurred in regard to a provision in the treaty for the payment to the Chinese Government of damages which had been done to some Chinese subjects in the United States. He will also remember what was said at that time as to the probability that a treaty might be negotiated and concluded if the State Department were at liberty or felt at liberty to make that concession to the Chinese Government. The Senator will probably recollect what was said by every member of the committee in regard to that matter.

The Senator from Alabama yesterday said that he understood or asserted it as absolute fact that the Chinese minister had plenary power to negotiate this treaty. I have never so understood it from the State Department. They have never so understood it. On the contrary, they stated that the original treaty and the amendment must go to China for ratification by the Chinese Government.

As I said the other day, it has been repeatedly charged that the amendment placed on the treaty by the Senate had delayed its ratification, had prevented its ratification by the Chinese Government. I undertake to say that there is no evidence in any Department of this Government that that is the case. On the contrary, the evidence is all the other way.

When the Senate ratified the treaty, with amendments, it was known in this city that the Chinese minister approved the amendments. I was informed that the amendments were telegraphed to the Chinese Government, and as I said before, the treaty had not reached the Chinese minister; it was still in the Department of Foreign Affairs; and I assert again not only that there is no evidence that the amendments delayed the ratification of the treaty or prevented its ratification, but my opinion is that the amendments were not unsatisfactory to the Chinese Government.

I agree, however, with the Senator from Nevada that the Chinese Government has not treated the United States fairly with regard to this treaty, and I will state why. When this treaty was being negotiated the Chinese minister desired to have such a provision put in the treaty as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] desired to put in this bill yesterday, that is that the treaty should not take effect so as to exclude Chinese laborers who have once been in the United States and gone out with certificates and were entitled to return, until after a certain fixed period after the treaty had been ratified. That was not done, but it was understood that the Chinese who were already out of the United States would have an opportunity between the date of the negotiation of the treaty and its ratification to return to the United States, and that is what they have been doing by thousands.

I have no doubt that that has been one great reason for the delay of the ratification of this treaty. I say if that is so the situation is so unusual that we have a right to act in order to prevent the return of those Chinese who would be excluded by the treaty and by the legislation under it when the treaty was ratified.

But I do not desire to discuss this question, Mr. President. There were merely those things in regard to it which I desired to say. I will not discuss it after all that has been said during the last few days in this body as to the attitude of the Senate and of the Republican party upon this question.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves to lay the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed on the table.

Mr. CALL. I should like to have the Senator withdraw that motion for a few moments.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator desire to discuss the question?

Mr. CALL. For a very few minutes.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to cut off debate. I shall withdraw the motion and have it renewed when the Senator from Florida closes.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for any length of time, but this is a very grave public question and suggestions have been made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] which are deserving of very great consideration, affecting the financial future of the country, affecting its commerce with China and our general commercial relations in the eastern countries. I should like to know, as this motion for reconsideration is objected to upon the ground of an urgent necessity, upon the ground that the courts of the United States in California are admitting persons who are not authorized to come here under the existing laws and treaty, why a bill requiring specific methods of proof to be administered by the court would not meet that urgent necessity, and why parol evidence should not be declared incompetent, if that be the difficulty? If the difficulty be in the method of proof and hearing, as is alleged, now administered by the courts of the United States in California, why not correct that evil by prescribing methods of proof which shall be certain and definite, and impossible of evasion?

It is also urged that this bill shall be passed and this reconsideration refused upon another ground, and that is, that these Chinese people in the city of San Francisco and in California are guilty of degrading practices, are opium-smokers, are people engaged in licentiousness of the most detestable character. Why can not the State of California so make and administer her laws as to correct that evil? Is it not the feature of this Government upon which we rely, that for domestic crimes, for matters occurring within the States, the power of the State government shall be exercised and is ample to cover it? It is as great as the criminal power of the United States courts. The State courts have precisely the same extent of power. Why not, if punitive measures are sufficient, exercise them and suppress these evils. There is no difficulty in this, and if there was, the bill under consideration does not touch this subject in any respect. It does not propose to remove the Chinaman in San Francisco.

But it seems to me as if this whole discussion and all these measures are intended to show which party or which individual will go farthest in appearing to persecute and oppress these Chinese people, as if that were the object rather than to devise a proper and an efficacious method of preventing their migration in any great numbers into this country, and at the same time preserving commercial relations and good feeling with the Government of China.

The proper object to be attained is to prevent the migration into this country of any very great number of these people so as to compete with American labor, so as to affect to any marked degree the habits or customs or social order of our people. If that be the object, why can not the States so provide, if they see fit, the General Government consenting thereto and making a treaty with China that no Chinaman shall be permitted to migrate or remain in the State of Oregon or California? I should like to know why not. I find in the Constitution an express provision which recognizes these powers in the State, in section 9 of Article I:

> The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

I presume that no one would claim that that is a power confined to the original States, and not a general power in all States either then or now existing. It clearly recognizes, in the absence of any provision by Congress or any prohibition, the power in the States to admit or to prohibit.

Suppose the National Government shall not exercise that power, and we shall by treaty with China say, the State of California objects to the presence of the Chinese there under any circumstances whatever, any portion of them, and by a treaty agreement we agree that the Chinese shall not be allowed the privilege or right either of temporary sojourn or occupation there, what prevents the State of California or the State of Oregon, or any other State from prohibiting the presence of a single Chinaman within her limits? If the object is to get rid of these people and prevent any intercourse whatever, is there not ample power to accomplish it in the States, the National Government consenting and aiding the States?

As to the efficacy of that kind of legislation to accomplish the exclusion of the Chinese, that is the most competent and efficacious means, and it is the power that can most efficaciously execute the laws upon this subject if it is the desire that no Chinamen shall be permitted in the country anywhere. Is not the State authority more generally and universally present? Are not the State officers more numerous in every county, in every locality? Are not the State courts more numerous throughout the country? If there be a State law, with the General Government aiding and assisting it, with no treaty obligations to the contrary, and if there be a public opinion and a law co-operating, why is it not the efficacious and the certain method of preventing the migration or the presence of Chinamen of any description in any State that desires to exclude them?

I have thought much upon this point during the discussions on this subject. If the people are so unanimous and so earnest as they appear to be upon the Pacific coast, and if Senators are so anxious that there should be no pollution of the people by Chinese amongst them, why should not the aid of State legislation, which was ample and sufficient to cover the whole subject, be invoked? No answer has ever been made to that proposition. I have called attention to it every time the subject has been before the Senate in the discussion of these bills. There can be no answer to it. The State power is ample, the National Government co-operating and aiding, to accomplish this end without involving the whole country in trouble in its commercial relations.

Mr. President, suppose you have a law of absolute exclusion, of non-intercourse, which this measure practically proposes with the Chinese Government, and these people cross the border either of Mexico or Canada into the United States, and are found within our country. It is not a very difficult matter for them to evade immediate contact with the officers of the United States. A marshal of the United States is not omnipresent. You must rely upon the local sentiment of the people for the execution of the laws, to communicate the intelligence that here is a Chinaman in this community without authority of law, and the execution of that law for the prevention of this evil, as it is considered, must depend alone upon the local sentiment of the people.

Therefore I undertake to say that if it be the desire to prohibit in this country the presence of all Chinamen, or of any number of them, the remedy is easily at hand in the legislation in the different States upon the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida if he thinks it would be competent for the Legislature of any State (the power to regulate commerce being in Congress), to prohibt the entrance to its borders of any English subject?

Mr. CALL. I do not think it would be, without the aid of Congress to that effect. But suppose Congress should make a treaty with England and should say that in the State of Massachusetts no Englishman shall be admitted except subject to the laws of Massachusetts, I want the Senator to tell me what would be the objection to that?

Mr. HOAR. The objection to that, in my judgment, is that it would be a regulation of commerce with foreign nations, which Congress can not remit to the States.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. CALL. I will.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he thinks a State would or would not have the power to say they might come within, but prevent becoming permanent residents within its borders those foreigners who are not admitted to naturalization? In other words, can Massachusetts exclude the Chinaman who is not entitled to be naturalized from permanent residence in the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I do not think she can.

Mr. CALL. The answer to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is twofold. In the first place, it is not a remission by the Congress of the United States of the power to regulate commerce to any State. It is an exercise by Congress of the power to regulate commerce in respect to that State in accordance with the laws of that State. As I said, it finds its warrant in the provision of the Constitution which prohibits Congress from interfering with the power of admission or rejection until a certain period of time, and in so doing it asserts after that time the power of Congress to exercise that prohibition or not in respect to each State. That is one answer.

The other answer is the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], that although it is commerce for an Englishman to come to Massachusetts or to any other State, and it would be a regulation of commerce to forbid them, it is not commerce for him to come there for the purpose of residence or remaining any length of time; and that is the evil complained of here. I apprehend that neither California nor any other State would find any cause of objection in the mere passage through their dominions of any class of people. I apprehend that it would not be at all difficult to formulate a law which would prevent any person passing through a State from stopping for such a length of time as would be objectionable to the people, and to so identify them that there could be no permanent remaining and no permanent occupation there.

I do not see therefore that this agitation has anything more in view than the question of presenting to the people of the Pacific coast the one side or the other side, the one man or the other man as being more in accordance with the public sentiment of the people there; that it is an electioneering scheme.

I am in favor of preserving the purity of this race and not interfering with the employments of our people to any unreasonable extent, and I shall be perfectly willing to acquiesce in any such legislation as reasonably attains that end. But that can be done without interfering with the commercial relations of our people with China. That can be done without non-intercourse. That can be done without asserting what everybody knows to be impossible and to be a mere pretense, the old exclusion policy of China, which the civilized people of the world forced her to abandon. We are here to-day in defiance of the whole civilization upon which our country rests asserting that we shall be absolutely excluded from all intercourse with a very large portion of the globe, upon the proposition that it is necessary in order to prevent the migration of their people in such numbers as to be a serious injury to our people. We are asserting a national policy of non-intercourse with the nations of the earth. We are making a declaration of public policy that contact between a superior and inferior civilization will destroy the superior. That isolation is our only protection against the Chinese. We have gone back on the dial of time eighteen hundred years.

That is the whole of the argument. The Senate of the United States, representing the most enlightened, wealthy, and powerful nation in the world, to-day affirms the principles and the policy of exclusion which the civilized world forced, at the point of arms, the Government of China to abandon, and both political parties here to-day are affirming, giving no reason whatever that can stand the test of investigation, that the prevention of the migration of the Chinese in such numbers as to affect the civilization, degrade the religion, and destroy the virtues of our people is necessary, notwithstanding it is plain that the criminal power vested in our courts and our State governments is ample to meet every exigency that requires the administration of punitive law, and the suppression of crime. Instead of the proper exercise of the powers of government to prevent crime, we declare that isolation is our only protection from Chinese crime.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment right there?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Going back to the point the Senator was discussing a moment ago, he called attention to section 9 of Article I of the Constitution, and after having read it, argued that inasmuch as that section provided that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808," it left the implication that the States had the power to prohibit immigration. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that provision only applied to the States in existence at the date of the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. CALL. That is true.

Mr. MITCHELL. It did not apply, and could not possibly apply, even if there is anything in the Senator's argument, which there is not, to any of the States west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. CALL. In terms, it does not.

Mr. MITCHELL. It only applies to States "now existing."

Mr. CALL. I called attention to that fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course it does not include California or Oregon or any State admitted into the Union after the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. CALL. I called attention to that fact, and also to the fact which the Senator recognizes at once as a matter of argument, but to which I now call his attention as a proposition which all admit, that the States do not derive their powers from the grant in the Constitution. The States have their powers from the people who created the State governments. The Constitution says that Congress shall not prohibit to the States "now existing," until the year 1808, the migration of any persons they see fit to admit.

Suppose Congress does not to-day prohibit immigration of Chinese to California. The Constitution does not give California the power to admit or to prohibit immigration, but the people of California have given the State government that power, and the Constitution of the United States admits that the people of California have the right in the absence of that prohibition to admit or prohibit. That power is uninterfered with by the Constitution and exists by virtue of the grant of power from the people of California in absolute plenitude.

Therefore I take it neither the Senator from Oregon nor any one else will question the fact in the absence of a prohibition by Congress that the power of any State is ample to admit or reject; but my proposition is, that with Congress consenting to and aiding the execution of the State power with a treaty stipulation with China, that no Chinaman shall be permitted to remain within the State of California for any length of time who is objectionable, or even not to enter there, and the State laws of California prohibiting it, it is perfectly within the power of California or of Oregon to-day, with this consenting legislation of the United States, that not a single Chinaman of any class, laborer, skilled or unskilled, scholar, scientist, philosopher, or any class of people, shall be permitted even to breathe the air of California or Oregon. There is ample power, therefore, without destroying the friendly and commercial relations of these two peoples, to exclude this evil from their borders. If this be true why should not this policy be adopted? Every one knows that contact between superiors and inferiors does not degrade the higher and stronger force. Every one knows that the dominant race controls the subject race or the inferior or lower force. Every one knows that distribution of product, and not monopoly of product, helps labor and increases wages and profit.

I ask what injury to California is it that there should be a Chinaman in Florida or in Massachusetts or in Louisiana? What harm is there that somebody there shall be able to employ a gardener or a washerman or give him some other employment? If you say it affects the labor of the people and substitutes an alien element not agreeable to our people, that is a good proposition if it exists in large proportions; but that does not exist to any great extent, and is not felt in those States.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Suppose the Chinaman has yellow fever and Florida chooses to locate the yellow fever; that is to say, the Chinaman in Florida, is it a matter of indifference to Georgia?

Mr. CALL. Oh, if he has yellow fever——

Mr. BLAIR. That is the question of fact we have decided. He has yellow fever.

Mr. CALL. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. Then we disagree.

Mr. CALL. I think the Almighty is a better judge than the Senator, and when He created four hundred million or five hundred million of Chinese people He knew better than the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. He created the yellow fever in the same way, according to the Senator's reasoning, and therefore yellow fever is a good thing and not to be avoided by those whose constitutions are adapted to yellow fever.

Mr. CALL. That may be the Senator's argument, and there is a great deal of that sort of argument in the world, and that is the argument on which this bill is supported—that the Almighty created yellow fever and the Chinamen, and that they are one and the same and to be abated in the same way and to the same extent.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask if the Senator's reasoning does not strike directly at the powers which the General Government exercises and which he assumed it to exercise the other day—if it does not strike at the same power which was exercised in the case of Florida hitherto, for the extinction or prevention of the spread of pestilential diseases?

Mr. CALL. I do not see it so.

Mr. BLAIR. If Congress finds the fact that the Chinaman not only does not assimilate but ought not to assimilate with the American civilization; that his presence in small numbers, unrestricted to become infinite numbers, and therefore overwhelming our civilization so as to be destructive of it—if Congress, having in view the general welfare, having control of commerce and our relations with foreign powers, where the Chinaman is, finds the fact to be that that Chinaman is detrimental in his influence to the civilization of the American people, and that located in some particular State he is dead sure to spread and go into all the other States, I ask the Senator is it not in exact analogy to that power by which we exclude by national force pestilential diseases from any portion of the country that we may undertake the prevention of the migration or immigration of the Chinaman to this country?

Mr. CALL. I think in some respects there is a kind of moral analogy between them.

Mr. BLAIR. Is not a moral analogy a very good kind of analogy? An immoral analogy would be a bad one.

Mr. CALL. Yes; it is very good, but it does not correspond with the reverse of the term moral in that connection.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the Senator meant a religious analogy.

Mr. CALL. No; I mean moral as opposed to physical or material. The Senator has read enough of philosophy in the school books of New Hampshire to be correct about that.

Mr. BLAIR. I was not talking about an intellectual matter, but a physical one, of course.

Mr. CALL. There is not very much intellectuality about this part of the matter. The difficulty in the mind of the Senator is simply this, and that seems to be the policy of this bill, that the Chinaman is yellow fever, that the Chinese people and the Chinese Government are yellow fever, and therefore the power of Congress of absolute exclusion is to be exercised. I deny all that. I believe the Chinese civilization has something which can be taught advantageously to all people. I believe that they have not existed four thousand years to our few hundred without having performed some part in the divine economy of the world. I believe that when other peoples and nations have been committing the most horrible cruelties, religious fanaticism and political cruelties, these people, who have existed so many years, with so many bright examples of the moral virtues which our religion teaches, are not, in the divine economy or the wise public economy of states, to be treated as a pestilence and a scourge and a necessary evil to be banished from all communication with mankind.

While acquiescing in the reasonable public policy of allowing our people to say that our industrial system, our habits of thought, our pursuits in life are so antagonistic to these people and theirs to ours that we do not want them, while I am willing to aid them, I need not for the purpose of doing that disregard all our orderly and proper methods of making laws and the execution of laws, and our respect for our treaty obligations and our good faith with other nations, and our respect, our decent respect, for the opinions of mankind.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator whether this is his proposition, that the incoming of the Chinese should be absolutely without national restriction save only as a national law may be made to assist such States in excluding the Chinaman from those States as may make laws for their exclusion? That is to say, if Florida decides to exclude the Chinaman, the National Government may assist Florida in excluding the Chinaman from that State; but if all the other States desire or are willing that the Chinaman should come, the national power should not interfere but should allow the Chinaman to come to those States?

Mr. CALL. I think until it gets to be a national evil, until the numbers are large enough, the national authority should not intervene to forbid States who desire to use them from doing so.

Mr. BLAIR. Who is to decide when it is a national evil if not the national authority?

Mr. CALL. Of course the National Government, the two Houses of Congress, and you, are to decide.

Mr. BLAIR. And the Senator from Florida. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] told us the other day that not only Congress but the whole American nation had decided that the immigration of the Chinese population was a national evil, and that we are here merely to record the verdict of the people and to see that it is carried out.

Mr. CALL. Yes, I believe he said that.

Mr. BLAIR. Then assuming that to be so, are we excusable in dallying about this exclusive legislation?

Mr. CALL. I think you unnecessarily deprive our people of great commercial advantages, and I do not think this exclusive legislation will answer your purpose. I do not believe that you can exclude these people by this kind of legislation without State legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. We can try it.

Mr. CALL. Furthermore, I think it very wise for every one, particularly those who have to vote upon these subjects, to be candid and say what they believe about it. If they believe, as the Senator from New Hampshire seems to do, that the Chinaman is necessarily an evil; that he is like the pestilence or the yellow fever, when we have twelve millions of African people as diverse as the Chinamen is from our own people, as different in their tastes and disposition as theirs—if he believes that these people are a public enemy and can not be permitted to come here under any circumstances or any condition, he is wise to say so and to vote for this legislation without any more candid expression of opinion.

I do not believe it. I believe that the Almighty has created no people who are not for some wise purpose in the world and capable of civilization, capable of improvement, and I believe it is the duty of all public policy, while carefully guarding their own people against evil and contamination, to establish the policy that while they protect their own people from evil they shall do the greatest good to others and establish the widest commercial relations with mankind. I believe in the commerce of thought and intelligence and production. I believe in the spread of intelligence and in the elevation and improvement of mankind.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CALL. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to ask the Senator from Florida whether he was in favor of excluding the Chinese from this country. There is no proposition, as I understand it, to exclude them from the world, but only to exclude them from this part of the world. I recognize their right to live and move and have their being, and enjoy their civilization, and all that, but not to move to this country.

Mr. CALL. I did not suppose there was any policy on the part of these gentlemen to make war on China and exterminate the Chinese.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from Florida whether he is in favor of excluding them or not?

Mr. CALL. I might answer that very well by saying that a man's opinions in a concrete form are very much like the opinions now on both sides of the Senate and in the other House—they are formed very much from political expediency. I am probably subject like others to that kind of necessity, that I am obliged to think of what is politically expedient.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I understand the Senator to be just now for political reasons in favor of excluding them?

Mr. CALL. No; but I say that I think a large number of Senators on both sides of this body are that way. My own personal opinion about it is this: I think the Chinese may very safely be admitted to this country in limited numbers.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. Why is it that both parties, with the exception of the Senator from Florida, are solid against the admission of Chinese to this country?

Mr. CALL. Because the people of the Pacific coast are solid.

Mr. BLAIR. Now, let me ask the Senator if he really thinks that is true?

Mr. CALL. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BLAIR. There was a time when the great body of the American people, or rather the northern portion of the American people, were opposed to the policy of the Pacific coast in excluding the Chinaman. I remember when our religious bodies, and our missionary people, and our intelligent people, men who wrote on the Declaration of Independence and wrote books on such subjects, were all on the side of the Chinaman. Something has changed their view, and it was not the clamor of the Pacific coast, for they made more then than they do now. Something has convinced the great body of the American people north of Mason and Dixon's line that on the whole these people ought to be kept out; that they are injuring our own civilization; that the entering wedge is on the Pacific coast; and that it is better for the Chinaman and better for us that they should live in their house and that we should live in ours. They have come to the conclusion, I think, that the best man on the face of the earth, the doctor of divinity or the philosopher, is not to invade the hut of the lowliest and occupy that space which is necessary for breathing and for existence on the part of whosoever has prior ownership and actual possession. I think the conviction of the people has changed there; and the people of the South, or the representatives of the Southern people, for some reason have changed their views; either it is that the negro is such a being as the Senator from Florida depicts him, incapable of assimilating——

Mr. CALL. I have said nothing about that.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, the Senator did; he spoke of the twelve millions of them, he will recollect.

Mr. CALL. I said they were as different to us in their color, taste, and habits as the Chinese.

Mr. BLAIR. The people of the South do not want 12,000,000, 50,000,000, or 100,000,000 more, who are not likely to become good American citizens, to whom we deny the suffrage and deny naturalization, or for some reason they are in accord with the sentiments of the North. The whole nation is one way. I ask the Senator if it is a fair thing to impeach motives, my motives, the motives of Democrats and Republicans alike everywhere, by saying that we are dallying with this question for mere political advantage? If we are wrong political advantage would be on a different side, for we all recognize the fact that there is no permanent political advantage which is not found by taking the morally right side of a question; and if we are wrong in our position in regard to the Chinese, political injury will result to all parties who oppose this immigration.

Mr. CALL. The answer to all that in my opinion is simply this: I have no power to judge of anybody's motives, and I doubt very much if the motive is very distinct to themselves. I can only judge of the reasons which they give when they tell me that they are opposed to the migration of these people because they are dissimilar in personal and mental characteristics, because they do not assimilate and intermix, and yet they have here twelve million people who are still more dissimilar, and who do not intermingle nor intermix to any very large extent. When I see that every people on the face of the earth is represented here more largely than the Chinese people, and I am told that in defiance of your own constitutional amendment which you put on the Constitution, to the effect that everybody from everywhere should be exactly equal and entitled to the same protection of the laws and have the same rights to be exercised, both political and personal——

Mr. BLAIR. That applies only to citizens.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon, it applies to all persons.

Mr. BLAIR. It applies to citizens born here or naturalized.

Mr. CALL. It applies to all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, but we will not argue about that. When I see that you, in direct denial of that proposition, which was made a constitutional amendment a few years ago, now affirm that these people are the exceptions, that the Indians and the Chinese people are the exception of all humanity with whom there can be no intercourse——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator if he understands that provision of the Constitution, the fourteenth amendment, about denying to all persons within the jurisdiction of a State the equal protection of the laws, to apply to Chinamen, to foreigners?

Mr. CALL. I understand it to apply to every person.

Mr. HOAR. Then I wish to ask the Senator one other question. What becomes of his argument that any State may compel one of them to leave its borders? Does he think that an equal protection of the laws?

Mr. CALL. I think so, when there is a treaty stipulation to that effect. I think that would be an excepted case and that would come within the jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction would be subject to and in accordance with the treaty, which is the supreme law of the land for that purpose. Otherwise the Senator from Massachusetts would be right; they would be protected by the constitutional amendment, and with a treaty stipulation, the supreme law of the land, they would have the right, because they come here under the treaty, and are not subject to the constitutional provision for our own people; they come under the treaty. We constantly by treaty with other nations limit their jurisdiction over our people in their country.

Mr. President, I do not care to prolong this discussion. The Senator from New Hampshire states issues which are not here. If there are to be 12,000,000 Chinese here, that is one proposition, and if necessary to stop that it would be proper to say that no Chinaman shall come to this country except for commercial purposes and temporary sojourn; but when there are no Chinamen in this country outside of California and Oregon, and a few who have been carried into some of the New England States within the last few years by capitalists, and who have met I believe with disfavor from the people there, when it is an evil scarcely felt in four-fifths of the country, that is another question; and that is what we are speaking of to-day, when there is no evil felt from Chinese immigration outside of the Pacific coast, when there is no complaint from our people elsewhere, when the only question is how to relieve the people of the Pacific coast of their presence without disturbing our commercial relations with China.

If you want to prohibit the building of railroads by them, as the Central Pacific was built by the thousands who were brought from China to do it, make a law and prohibit their being here for doing this, that, or the other kind of labor, or in this, that, or the other numbers.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has several times called to our attention the existence of the negro population in this country as in some way bearing on this proposed legislation. I wish to remind him that in just the same way that we allow the negro who is here to remain, we permit the Chinaman who has come by authority of law to remain also, so that the two classes are upon the same ground in that respect. As to the future, it seems the general policy is to exclude the Chinaman. I ask the Senator whether he would be in favor of the exclusion of negro immigration for all future time?

Mr. CALL. I would prevent their coming in any large numbers. I wound exclude the negroes coming from Africa in large numbers. I would not exclude a limited and inconsiderable number of them. I would not admit them to naturalization or make citizens of them. Neither the Chinese. The evil would consist entirely in the number who should be allow to come.

Mr. BLAIR. You would apply, then, the same principle to the negro that our legislation applies to the Chinaman and for precisely the same reason?

Mr. CALL. No, I do not put them on the same ground, nor is it necessary that I should do so. The proposition the Senator made was, the objection to the Chinamen is because they are different from our people. They are different in appearance, in tastes from our people. They do not assimilate with them.

Mr. BLAIR. What other objection have you to the negro? You do not object to his labor?

Mr. CALL. No, I do not object to him at all. I have made no objection to him.

Mr. BLAIR. If you have no objection to him, why not let him come?

Mr. CALL. I have said that the black man is as different from the white man as the yellow man. Do you deny it?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know.

Mr. CALL. I have said that the superstitious black man is as different from the intelligent, religious, and public spirited and educated white man as an ignorant and supertitious yellow man is from the white man. Do you deny it? I have said nothing about the intelligent colored men. I have found no fault with them.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know how that is.

Mr. CALL. I think not, and I think that is about the idea of this legislation. It is all predicated upon precisely such propositions.

Mr. President, I do not desire to go any further into this subject. I am as willing as any one else to protect the people of this country from the inroad of any people who will interfere with the occupations and pursuits of our people, with their sympathies and their tastes and social order; that will introduce alien and unfriendly elements into it; but, while I have voted for every one of these measures, I insist and I wish to declare my opinion that they are not based upon a wise, a sound, and an efficacious public policy adapted to the wise and just end of preventing the migration of these people in any large numbers, and at the same time preserving commercial relations and friendly feeling with the Empire of China and its millions of people.

I wish further to say that, in connection and in common with that, I regard the preservation of friendly relations with China and all eastern nations as an important one to the civilization and the Christian civilization of this country, and I wish to say that I consider that there is much in the Oriental nations which is worthy of study and is not injurious in contact with the civilization of the western continent. We have a great duty to perform as a great light to humanity, as well as a duty to our own people. They are both consistent with each other, and must be performed by intercourse with the nations of the earth and not by non-intercourse.

Mr. TELLER. I now move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. BLACKBURN'S name was called). The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). Before I vote I will ask if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] can inform me how his colleague [Mr. GEORGE] would vote on this question?

Mr. WALTHALL. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is at liberty to vote.

Mr. BLAIR. I vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO (when Mr. FAULKNER'S name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I transfer the pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], which enables the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and myself both to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired, as I said before, with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. PLATT'S name was called). The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] I think has been called home for a day or two, and I understand him to be paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], with the understanding that the Senator from South Carolina may vote on this question if he chooses.

Mr. HAMPTON. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] told me that he expected to be here to vote on this question and I might feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I think he has just gone away, and I understood from him that the Senator from South Carolina was at liberty to vote on this question if he saw proper.

Mr. HAMPTON. Very well. I vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has been transferred to my colleague [Mr. BOWEN]. Therefore I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrain from voting. I would vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], but I am advised by his colleague [Mr. TELLER] that I can vote on this proposition, the pair having been transferred to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. I vote "nay."

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT]. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I do not know how he would vote.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

Mr. HOAR. During the morning hour this morning the resolution introduced by me calling upon the President for certain information was passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that it should be postponed until a later hour of the day, because a message from the President was expected. A message has come in, but it relates to an entirely different subject. I ask the Senator from Missouri if there is any objection to having the resolution adopted at this time.

Mr. VEST. I have none.

Mr. HOAR. Then I ask that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR September 6, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the attention of the President be respectfully called to the resolution of the Senate, adopted August 28 ultimo, requesting him to communicate to the Senate copies of all communications addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating against certain unfair treatment of our citizens, and that he be requested to furnish such information as soon as possible, in order that it may be considered in acting upon legislation now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SNYDER, indefinitely.

To Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, indefinitely.

To Mr. PARKER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. RYAN, vice Mr. BUTTERWORTH, as one of the House conferees on the bill (H. R. 10908) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

DUTY ON COTTON BAGGING.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition, signed by a number of citizens of Sharp County, Arkansas, praying that cotton bagging be put upon the free-list; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, your petitioners, respectfully represent that whereas the tariff on cotton bagging is robbing the South of millions of dollars, therefore we respectfully ask that it be placed immediately on the free-list.

QUARANTINE LANDS, LOUISIANA.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10931) to donate and transfer to the State of Louisiana for quarantine purposes certain lands on the Mississippi River belonging to the United States, subject to reversion to the United States in the event of their non-usage for quarantine purposes, and requiring the proper department of the United States Government to execute the necessary transfer to the State of Louisiana on the condition aforesaid, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it has become necessary, in the opinion of the board of health of the State of Louisiana, to remove the Mississippi River quarantine station from its present location to a point more remote from the surrounding settlements in order to isolate it more effectually from contact with the people living in the neighborhood, and to prevent intercourse between vessels in quarantine and the adjacent shores, and thus prevent the danger of spreading contagious diseases; and

Whereas there are no other lands suitable or available for the relocation of said station at a point lower on the Mississippi River than its present site other than certain lands, a portion of which belonging to the United States, and especially withdrawn from public sale or entry by act of Congress of June —, 1875: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of maintaining a quarantine station on the Mississippi River the United States hereby donates and transfers to the State of Louisiana all that portion of land known as sections 13 and 14, in township 21 south, range 19 east, southeastern district of Louisiana, east of the Mississippi River, said lands measuring 1,272 feet front on the Mississippi River, being swamp lands, and extending a half mile to the sea in the rear, and bounded above by section 12, patented to Jonathan Jones and Peter Runder in 1843, and bounded below by section 15, patented to Janet Bister and Angelo Laussade in 1839, which sections 13 and 14 were withdrawn from public sale or entry by act of Congress of 1875: Provided, That should the State of Louisiana at any time cease to use said lands for quarantine purposes, then, and in that event, said lands shall revert to the Government of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the proper Department of the Government of the United States shall, on and after the passage of this act, execute to the State of Louisiana the proper transfers of said lands, on the conditions hereinbefore expressed.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out in the preamble the words "act of Congress" and insert "proclamation of the President;" and fill the blank after the word "June," in the same line, by the insertion of the word "first;" so that it will read: "by proclamation of the President of June 1," etc.

Mr. WILKINSON. The report is only about twelve lines in length, and it will only consume a minute to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The report (by Mr. PAYSON) was read, as follows:

The reasons for the passage of this bill are given in the preamble to the act itself. The committee is informed that the lands described in the bill are insignificant in value, their suitability for quarantine purposes consisting in their distance from inhabited and cultivated areas. The bill has been submitted for an opinion to both the Interior and the War Departments, and letters from the Acting Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior are appended and made a part of this report.

The committee is of the opinion that the passage of this act will assist the efforts of the board of health of the State of Louisiana, at whose instance this bill has been presented, and contribute to the health and protection from contagious diseases of large areas of our country.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. In lines 16 and 17 of the bill I move to strike out the words "act of Congress" and insert "proclamation of the President."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILKINSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDIE BELL.

Mr. NUTTING. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Addie Bell and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the payment, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Addie Bell, daughter of Maranda Bell, deceased, mother of John S. Bell, late private in Company C, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment New York State Volunteers, the pension granted by certificate numbered 231248, to the said Maranda Bell, computing the amount due to the day of her death only.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state the amount involved?

Mr. NUTTING. I can not do that; it is, however, quite small. The certificate came in the morning of the day after the death of the mother, and this daughter had taken care of her mother and paid the funeral expenses.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let her have it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. NUTTING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREARY. Regular order.

PURCHASE OF NEW MAIL LOCKS AND KEYS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, asks unanimous consent that the committee have leave to report at any time a bill making appropriations for the purchase or manufacture of new mail locks and keys.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The object is for the procurement of new mail locks and keys. If there be no objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection.

POSTPONED PENSION CASES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw the demand for the regular order for a moment, to permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman can do that without withdrawing the demand.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Some weeks ago, in fact some months past, a number of pension-increase bills were passed at the Friday night sessions through several readings, upon which bills the previous question was ordered and days fixed for their consideration in the House. This being private bill day, I would like to ask the Speaker why the House can not take up these bills and pass them now, as we can not get them passed at the night session because of the lack of a quorum.

Mr. BLAND. That is not a parliamentary question. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Would they not come up as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heretofore decided that these bills lost none of their rights or privileges under the rules of the House on account of the fact of being made a special order; and that the day on which they were set apart for consideration having lapsed, they would come up in their regular order on private bill day. But the gentleman from Kentucky demands the regular order, and it is the duty of the Chair to call the committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the call of the committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Mr. McCREARY. I now ask unanimous consent that members having reports from committees be allowed to hand them in at the desk.

There was no objection.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR, AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to submit a privileged report—a report of a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. McCREARY. How much time does the gentleman expect this will consume?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Only a very few moments. I submit the report in the absence of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON], who is necessarily absent to-day.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 2252) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The report was adopted.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up the special order for this hour, House bill 11309, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, having yielded the greater part of the time to which as a member of the committee I was entitled to my colleagues from Massachusetts, Mr. DAVIS and Mr. COGSWELL, who represent large fishing constituencies, I can hardly add anything to their pointed, bright, and graceful speeches.

Behind every business interest England plants her treasury, her social influence, and her guns. Her skilled diplomacy overreaches American simplicity on every occasion. The lately attempted treaty and this war on paper will pass into history as but further illustrations of how Americans can be outwitted and how politicians often place reliance on the supposed gullibility of the American people.

The treaty gave away existing rights and gained nothing of permanent value. While I fully recognize that wine and social influence are large factors in modern diplomacy, I can not yet lose faith in that true American spirit that, unawed by power, resisting flattery on the one hand and unmindful of threats on the other, pursues a straightforward, manly course, standing firmly by American rights.

When the begartered Englishman gives a dinner, the American woman worships at the shrine and the American man straightway loses his head. We are then called "American cousins," and are told that "blood is thicker than water." While the wine of social prestige is poured in full glasses, there is an English eye kept strictly on business. Our great-grandmothers at Boston did not drink English tea after that fashion.

American business opportunities are better for us than the advancement of English business interests.

While we grant by this bill additional power as requested by the President, we must rely greatly on his discretion. He must protect our fishermen from the grievous wrongs and indignities heaped upon them and the flag by Canada. During these negotiations the unfortunate idea has gained currency that "we must not go to war on account of a few fish." While we should by all honorable means avoid war, yet as a nation, holding in our hands the hopes of a world seeking the highest freedom, aside from the preservation of our business interests, we owe something to mankind to see to it that the great Republic always stands firmly for the recognition of its rights. The experiment of free government must not fail from the want of pluck.

Our fishing interests are sometimes underestimated. Aside from the profits arising from the industry itself, the business creates a hardy class of men, trained and skilled seamen, accustomed to the dangers and familiar with our northeast coast. England understands the value of such a class of men. She wishes Canada to have a monopoly of the fishing trade. She looks ahead. She knows the value of skilled men upon the sea. Our little fishing fleet upon the coast furnishes the nucleus for the greater fleets when for us the trying hour shall come, as come it surely will.

Not alone, then, with an eye to business, but from other considerations, we must protect and guard our fishing interests.

Mr. MORROW. I surrender fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING].

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the questions now before the House, we have need of all the calm and deliberate judgment at our command. It should be, and I doubt not is, the desire of all that we do nothing which is harmful and that we do, and authorize to be done, everything needful to the welfare and dignity of our great country.

Here it is expected that all questions worthy of serious consideration will be treated in a way to comport with the dignity and exalted standing of the nation we represent.

Whenever we approach legislation which is to affect our people by themselves, the responsibility is indeed great, and we all realize that this responsibility is increased when we formulate or attempt to formulate a rule of action and conduct between our Government and any other nation.

It has been a long time since Congress discussed questions so full of the look of possible war with a foreign nation as the questions presented by this message.

War at any time and under all circumstances is a serious business, and war with England at this time, with our defenseless condition on the coasts and on the seas, would at least place us, to start with, in a position we do not desire if it can be avoided with honor.

The requests in this most curious state paper and the reasons given for them, when coupled with the times and circumstances now surrounding the American people, will at least insure this document a place among the curosities of history. If dramatic effect was the object of the President in giving to the country and to the world this message, no disappointment will follow. If the object of the President, when viewed from the plane in national affairs above the fog and fuz of politics and partisanship, was to obtain necessary power to right the wrongs referred to, then this message was not only statesmanlike, but patriotic.

If the President, however, has for a long time had and now has ample power to redress these wrongs, and has known of the wrongs and abuses referred to and failed to apply the ample remedy in his hands, and has waited the present juncture of political affairs to call for legislation he did not need, then, indeed, has the United States been humiliated before its own people and before the nations of the earth by this action.

I for one will not oppose the passage of any act which is necessary in order that the President have full power to right all wrongs perpetrated upon us as a nation or against any citizen or his property entitled to be protected by our Government.

I mean this in the broadest sense. Even though the President now has all the power asked for in his message, for one I will vote to duplicate it. The continuance of financial evils in the face of power to correct them, vested in the President, has before during this Congress been excused and condoned by legislative action. I now refer to the resolution passed to construe the law authorizing the President to purchase the obligations of the Government with the surplus in the Treasury.

I very well know that all the wrongs, slights, and humiliations referred to in the message have been put upon our Government and upon our people, and I know as well that other wrongs not mentioned have been heaped upon us by the Canadian provinces, under the advice and assistance of the British Government. I believe I know, too, that the Chief Executive for a long time has had cognizance of all these wrongs and that he and his administration have time and time again been called upon to redress them, and that they have always neglected and failed and now neglect and refuse to use the ample power existing to that end.

Has the President and his administration had for more than a year and a half power to redress and retaliate for these wrongs? If this power has existed and now exists, then, indeed, the country and world is called upon to believe that power is asked for already existing in order to cover neglect of the rights of the nation and people, and this, too, in order to retrieve ground lost by a policy which placed the President and his party in a position to be honestly charged with being more English than American in their financial views.

A long line of action on the part of this Administration has satisfied the country that a new policy was being initiated in regard to our financial matters, and that this policy was in the interest of British labor and British capital. I now refer to the free-trade doctrines lately and now promulgated and agitated by the President and the majority in this House.

It was faulty judgment which caused the President and his party to think that this righteous judgment and prejudice held by the people could be done away with by this message of eight pages, especially when that message is promulgated in the face of a Presidential election in which the responsible author of it has an absorbing personal interest.

It was faulty judgment, indeed, that caused the President and his party to think that even the humblest and poorest American citizen would not fathom the flimsy pretexts which are put forward to excuse the most wonderful and sudden conversion to the long ago and oft reiterated policy of the Republican party with regard to our dealings with the British provinces on the north.

Now let us examine closely for a little time the President's message and see what we find in it. On the first page of the message the President says upon the subject of the fisheries:

> Our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises in waters adjacent to Canada have been subjected to numerous vexatious interferences and annoyances, their vessels have been seized upon pretexts which appeared to be entirely inadmissible, and they have been otherwise treated by the Canadian authorities and officials in a manner inexcusably harsh and oppressive.

On page 2 of the message he says upon this subject:

> In the year 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond and free of duty through Canadian territory to this country; and ever since that time such shipment has been denied.

These two abstracts contain all the complaint made by the President in regard to the abuse of our fishery rights.

The President has not dared to ask for legislation to empower him to retaliate because of these wrongs, except in regard to the transit trade perhaps, for the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, which now has been in force for more than a year and a half gives the President ample power to retaliate for the abuse of our fishery rights. Indeed, it was passed for that very purpose. Here is the law:

> An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes.
> Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessel or fishermen having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places in the British dominions of North America, or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any privilege therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies, as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved March 3, 1887.

This law plainly and without circumlocution gave him the warrant to exercise almost unlimited power in retaliation for the violation by Canadians of our fishing rights.

These fishery rights of the United States had been violated over and over again prior to March 3, 1887, and this law was by Congress passed that the President might act to redress those wrongs. Our fishery rights have been violated over and over again since the passage of this act, a year and a half ago, and yet not a thing has been done by the President or this Administration, even, until to-day.

Senators and Representatives have over and over again called the attention of the country and the President to specific wrongs against our rights in this regard. The press of the country from Maine to California has teemed with articles showing these wrongs and demanding that some action be taken. Nothing has been done, no move made; not the slightest effort toward putting this law in force has been made even to this time.

The President in his message does not make the attempt to excuse himself for not using the power given him by this law to stop infringements and outrages on the rights of our fishermen and vessels. When no attempt is made at excuse for this neglect, the President for once is consistent with the facts, for there is no possible excuse.

What could the President have done to retaliate? Why, look at the act of March 3, 1887, and see. He could by proclamation have denied "vessels, their masters and crews," belonging to the British dominions of North America, "any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States." Has he done it? No, confessedly not: nor has he made the first simple move to that end.

What would the effect have been if the President had carried out this law of March 3, 1887, in an attempt to stop outrages upon our vessels and sailors engaged in fishing? Why it would have shut every American port to every vessel of the Dominion of Canada. It would have closed the St. Clair Flats Canal to the ships of our unfair neighbors; it would have shut the ponderous gates of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal against all vessels attempting to go through except our own, and it would have closed the waters of Lake Michigan to all the Lake trade on the part of Canada. By the time all this had been done the Canadian authorities would have commenced to devise ways and means to avoid such retaliation, and the "ways and means" would have been the utter abandonment of all outrages and wrongs upon our fishermen and their calling. The Canadian Government would long since have cried enough, and our fishery trouble would have been a thing of the past.

In his message, page 7, the President says:

I desire also to call the attention of the Congress to another subject involving such wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens as in my opinion requires prompt action.

The navigation of the Great Lakes and the immense business and carrying trade growing out of the same have been treated broadly and liberally by the United States Government and made free to all mankind, while Canadian railroads and navigation companies share in our country's transportation upon terms as favorable as are accorded to our own citizens.

The canals and other public works, built and maintained by the Government along the line of the lakes, are made free to all.

In contrast to this condition and evincing a narrow and ungenerous commercial spirit, every lock and canal which is a public work of the Dominion of Canada is subject to tolls and charges.

Here the President states pregnant facts. Facts when analyzed show a virtual abandonment on the part of Canada of attempt to comply with treaty obligations. What does this charge of the President refer to? What does it mean? What in plain language are the facts about this business?

Let us see a little, so the people may understand all about it and see the really grave wrongs which the Canadian Government, backed by England, has for years placed in the way of our commerce, enjoying the rights and privileges the United States long ago bought and paid for.

From Ogdensburgh, on the St. Lawrence River, the United States has its own water way to Duluth, the western end of Lake Superior, with the exception of passage from Lake Ontario into Lake Erie. Between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie forty years ago the Canadian Government built the Welland Canal, which has cost already $50,000,000.

The United States never has had any way to pass its ships between these two lakes except as it asked the leave and had the license of Canada and England, and for forty years now we have humiliated ourselves and hampered and endangered our commerce by failing to build an American water way from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario on the American side.

It is just at this point and place and this is the only point and place that the Canadian Government now discriminates against our commerce so as to warrant the language quoted from the President's message.

In the place of building our own canal, as long ago we ought to have done, and as now at this late day we ought to do and will do, we attempt to make a treaty with Canada and England so we might use the Welland Canal on the same terms as the same was used by the British provinces themselves. In the treaty of 1871 between Canada, England, and America the following articles will be found:

ARTICLE XXVII.

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

ARTICLE XXVIII.

The navigation of Lake Michigan shall also, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, be free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, subject to any laws and regulations of the United States bordering thereon not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

It would be supposed that under these articles there could be no doubt but that our ships and cargoes would have the same rights and privileges of passage through the Welland Canal as the ships and cargoes of Canada and England; but it has not been so. Canada, under these clauses, has all the time in the past used, free of charge, St. Clair Flats Canal, so Ste. Marie Canal, Lake Michigan, and even all the canals in the State of New York.

But when our ships from the West, loaded with cargoes to be discharged in American ports, passed through this canal, the Canadian Government charged and has received 20 cents tolls upon each ton. When our ships and cargoes, bound from one American port east of this canal to an American port west of the same passed through it, each ton of the cargo paid 20 cents into the Canadian treasury.

On the other hand, Canadian and English shipping and cargoes passing this canal from any port west with cargo for Montreal or export or passing the canal going west paid no toll. Here was a plain discrimination against our commerce of 20 cents on each ton. For instance, a vessel loaded with 1,000 tons of wheat or corn, or, in fact, any freight bound from Chicago to Oswego, N. Y., Charlotte, Ogdensburgh, Big Sodus, or Little Sodus, all American ports, would for tolls through the Welland Canal be obliged to pay $200.

The same cargo in a British or Canadian vessel bound from any port west of the Welland Canal to Montreal, Quebec, or any port east of there would pay no tolls for passage through the Welland Canal. This has been the course of management for years, and is the course of management to-day.

Here is discrimination, here is forced contribution, here is tribute to the dishonest greed of England with a vengeance. Two hundred dollars difference in the cost of passing these vessels through a canal which by Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 was to be used by Americans upon the same terms with Canada and England.

What does this amount to? What has it amounted to in the past? And what will it amount to if not remedied?

I will give you the amount of the cereals alone passing through this canal bound from American port to American port which has paid this discriminating toll during the past sixteen years.

Here then, is 2,643,621 tons of produce going from American port to American through the Welland Canal during the past sixteen years, and each ton paying a freight of 20 cents, or a total sum of $528,724.60, and the same amount of Canadian freight or British freight has paid nothing.

Here in sixteen years we have paid, upon food products alone, $528,724.60 more than by Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 we ought to have paid. The amount of this discrimination is equivalent on an average of over a half-cent per bushel on wheat, corn, and other cereals.

It has been said, and truly said, that often one-half cent on a bushel of wheat or corn determines whether it can be exported at profit or not. So you see that England and Canada have all these years, and now have, under this discriminating toll, the absolute control of all this trade. They have had, and now have, the absolute control of the commerce of Lake Ontario with its 7,500 square miles of navigable waters. This control is absolute, and would apply in case of war as well as in peace.

We have no passage, by canal or otherwise, from Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence into Lake Erie, so that we must make such bargain as we can with Canada and England, our commercial and financial rivals, for right of passage between these waters.

Is this giving the same privileges to the inhabitants of the United States in the navigation of the Welland Canal that is accorded to the inhabitants of Canada or the most favored nation? Confessedly not, and so this message says.

The message, however, gives us no news on that subject. This has been just as it is now during the continuance of this Administration. Why has the President failed to remedy the evil? Why has he not retaliated to bring about fair dealing and honest work by the Canadian Government under this treaty?

The President intimates he wants more power. He wants Congressional warrant by legislation in order to stop the evil. He intimates and wants the country to believe that the bill now before the House must be passed before he can stop this discrimination in the canals. Is it true that he does need more power to retaliate for this wrong? Not at all. He has had ample power ever since he was President to stop it, and without asking of Congress any assistance. There are two grounds upon which I base this assertion:

First. It will be noticed that Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871, which provides that we may use the British canals on the same terms as themselves, also provides for the use of our canals by that people on the same terms as we use them. I will quote Article XXVII that this may be seen:

ARTICLE XXVII.

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

This article constitutes a contract between Great Britain and Canada on one side and ourselves on the other. This contract having been broken over and over again, and for a long series of years openly violated by Great Britain and Canada, it has been for years of no binding force on us.

We could have closed our waters and our canals and our ports to Canada at once upon her breaking the contract which bound us to give her the rights referred to. The President, however, wanted more power. He was and is a lawyer, and knew that a broken contract could not be enforced by the party violating it, and yet he wanted more power, and Congress more than a year and a half ago gave him more power, ample power, by the passage of the act of March 3, 1887.

Many jump at the conclusion that this act simply related to the fisheries; simply gave the President power to retaliate for wrongs committed upon our fishing rights. Not so, however. It did give ample power to the President to retaliate for wrongs to our fishing interests, and it at the same time, however, gave ample power to him to redress and stop the wrongs committed upon our commerce by this very discrimination we are discussing. I will quote the act, so no error may be made:

An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved March 3, 1887.

Now let us look at this act and see what power it was meant to give, and what power it did give the President. Let us see for what wrongs under this act he could retaliate. Look at the title of the act and see what Congress intended to cover. It says:

An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Here it will be seen at a glance that the rights of other than fishing vessels, to wit, "American trading and other vessels," were to be protected. These were to be protected in certain cases. What cases? Is the case of discrimination in tolls on the Welland one? Yes, it is one, and I will show why and how it is.

The part of the body of the act of March 3, 1887, which applies to this wrong and discrimination in tolls is as follows, and is perfectly plain:

Or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere.

Is not charging one of our vessels and its cargo 20 cents a ton for passage through the canal, and charging nothing to Canadian vessels or British vessels and their cargoes for doing the same thing, where by Article XXVII, treaty of 1871, both have an equal right to pass and on the same terms, "denying privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nations?" Is it not unjustly vexing and harassing our vessels, their masters and crews, to stop at the entrance of this Welland Canal and demand 20 cents per ton tolls before they are allowed to pass, and in the same hour allow a Canadian vessel or a British vessel to pass free?

Thompson Kingsford & Son, starch-makers in Oswego, N. Y., shipped from Western American ports by Welland Canal to Oswego, to be used in making starch, 6,800 tons of corn. This was less than half the amount used by that establishment. Here was 242,857 bushels of corn which cost this establishment $1,360 more to get it from the West than would have been charged if Mr. Kingsford's works had been at Montreal, in Canada. Here is $1,360 discriminating tolls paid by one manufacturing establishment in one year.

Oh, yes; it is too plain to argue; it is too plain to take up time with. Here under this law the President of the United States for more than a year and a half has had power to retaliate for these discriminations in tolls on the Welland Canal. What could he have done? Why, in the words of the bill:

Then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

He could, you see, shut our canals; he could have shut our ports, and even shut Lake Michigan to all Canadian and British vessels. Did the President do it? No; but he comes to Congress now and wants it to pass a law allowing the American authorities to charge Canadian and British vessels and cargoes the same tolls they charge our vessels. War, retaliation, and revenge this would be indeed!

He talks of retaliation by imposing tolls when he has the power by law to shut every canal and every water and every port to Canadian vessels and British vessels.

I have sometimes thought that this discrimination on our commerce by the British Government in the Welland Canal was a judgment on America for its neglect of its own interests.

Here is a barrier of 8 miles of rock and soil on the American side, and there were 30 miles of rock and soil on the British side, which prevented ships passing between these lakes. A mention of Niagara Falls will explain the physical condition without further words.

The British Government, more than forty years ago, saw the commercial advantage and necessity of uninterrupted navigation between these waters; and at an expense of $50,000,000 that shrewd and far-seeing people built the Welland Canal, and having it, they commanded the position perfectly.

All these past forty years American commerce has been humiliated and harassed by being obliged to pass this British water way and pay tribute to British greed. This has been true until our commerce has been driven off Lake Ontario and St. Lawrence River. This great lake and the St. Lawrence River, forming the northern boundary of the great State of New York for 250 miles, has been by this baby policy of ours, abandoned to Canada and England.

We could have had, and ought to have had, and now will have a canal of our own. A canal 8 miles long, costing $10,000,000, will put it beyond the power of Canada or England to stop our American vessels or make them pay tribute for passage from Ogdensburgh, on the St. Lawrence, to the queen city of the West, Chicago, or the far-famed metropolis of the Northwest, Duluth.

The American people, for the protection of commerce in peace and for the better protection of our country in war, demand that petty local interests and mistaken national economy be laid aside and that we have an unbroken, untrammeled American water way, so that we can without treaty, without obligation, and without humiliation utilize the St. Lawrence River and all the lakes and connecting waters on our northern frontier.

The British Government and Canada can traverse the whole distance from the Atlantic on the east to Duluth on the west in their own waters with one exception, and that is the entrance into Lake Superior from Huron, and the sound of activity comes to us from the Northwest as England, even now, commences to carve a canal of her own so this difficulty will be overcome.

Let us at the same time burst through the barrier at the Falls of Niagara, so that when Canada can pass into Lake Superior without using our canal at that point that we shall be able to pass from Lake Erie into Ontario without using the Welland Canal. Good management for times of peace demands it; and the possible troublesome times of war demand it; and pride and patriotism demand it.

England has now one hundred and eleven iron-built vessels so constructed that they may be sent from Liverpool, England, to Duluth or Chicago. These vessels in time of peace are messengers of prosperity, and their cargoes only conduce to make the people happy and prosperous. It is easy to see, however, how each one of these might convey cargoes and crews over the same route bent upon war, and destruction, and waste.

Each of these vessels might easily carry cannon of the longest range. Eight States and their twenty millions of people are situated upon the shores of the Great Lakes, and it is time and high time that proper steps were taken to guard this easily reached and utterly defenseless country.

But the President calls loudly for one other power or authority to do one other thing, and that is to stop the bonded transit transportation now in vogue. He says that the United States was notified in 1886 that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish home over the railroads of the Dominion of Canada, and for this he wants power to retaliate in kind; that is, he desires to stop the shipment of Canadian and English property in bond as it is now being carried on by rail and by water.

The first act of Congress which was passed and which is now in force, permitting the British provinces to ship property in bond without paying duty, was passed in 1866, and is as follows:

SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

This act, it will be noticed, only authorizes the shipment in bond through our territory by the British provinces property arriving at Portland, Me., Boston, Mass., and New York City bound for these provinces. Under these statutes no property could or can be shipped in bond to the British provinces, coming by way of any other than these three ports named, unless by the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This, however, is not all the authority for the transit in bond trade by the Dominion of Canada. The President has run across and wrestled with Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, and he convinces himself at least that this article is no longer in force. The article referred to reads as follows:

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that for the like period goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the government of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

It will be noticed that the statutes of 1866, quoted by me, gave power to ship goods in bond through the United States by the British provinces only when the same started from Portland, Boston, or New York and went to Canada. This treaty article, however, grants the right to Canadians to ship across our territory from one point in Canada to another, and from Canada across our territory to one of our ports and thence export the same.

Then comes the act of Congress, March 1, 1873, to carry into effect the treaty of 1871, and here is that law:

[GENERAL NATURE—No. 46.]

An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada, and the Legislature of Prince Edward Island have passed laws on their part to give full effect to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at the city of Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, as contained in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, he is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that he has such evidence, and thereupon, from the date of such proclamation, and so long as the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada or of Prince Edward Island, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty.

SEC. 2. That whenever the colony of Newfoundland shall give its consent to the application of the stipulations and provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV of said treaty, inclusive, to that colony, and the Legislature thereof, and the Imperial Parliament shall pass the necessary laws for that purpose, the above-enumerated articles, being the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, from and after the date of a proclamation by the President of the United States declaring that he has satisfactory evidence that the said colony of Newfoundland has consented, in a due and proper manner, to have the provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, of the said treaty extended to it, and to allow the United States the full benefits of all the stipulations therein contained, and shall be so admitted free of duty so long as the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty.

SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been, or may from time to time be, specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions, through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States.

SEC. 4. That from the date of the President's proclamation, authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States, upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States, as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land-carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States: And provided further, That the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals of the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty: And provided further, That in case any export or other duty continues to be levied after the 16th day of June, 1872, on lumber or timber of any kind cut on that portion of the American territory, in the State of Maine, watered by the river St John and its tributaries, and floated down that river to the sea, when the same is shipped to the United States from the province of New Brunswick, that then, and in that case, the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend all rights of carrying provided for by this section for such period as such export or other duty may be levied.

SEC. 5. That this act shall not take effect until the 1st day of July, 1873, and shall not apply to any article of merchandise therein mentioned which shall be held in bond on that day by the customs officers of the United States.

Now, let us take up these acts one after another and see what in fact and in truth troubles the President; not what he tries to make it appear troubles him in his desire to stop the British transit traffic, but what really does bother him.

The act of 1864, allowing the British dominions to ship in bond without payment of duty from Portland, Boston, and New York, by its terms may be suspended by the Secretary of the Treasury. In fact, under this law the Secretary did at one time suspend the transit business so far as it related to Mexico. The bonded transit trade with Mexico or by Mexico is authorized by the same law, and Senator SHERMAN, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, stopped the whole business. Here is precedent for the present Secretary to do the same thing with Canada. Here is precedent for the President to have caused his Secretary of the Treasury to have stopped this part of the bonded transit business long ago.

Now, let us look at Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871. For two reasons the President need not be, nor should he have been, stopped from retaliation on the subject of bonded transit trade with Canada by this article. In the first place, the President says in his message, and proves to his own satisfaction at least, that this Article XXIX was done away with in 1885, under the joint resolution of Congress. Assume that he is correct in this conclusion, and that Article XXIX was swept away in 1885, then it must follow that the act of March 1, 1873, so far as it relates to or carries into effect Article XXIX, went with it, and there is no law in force except the act of 1864, which we have seen may be abrogated.

In the second place, this very act of Congress, March 1, 1873, by its very terms provides that the President may suspend by proclamation the carrying in bond provided by that act and Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 at any time when the Canadian Government fails to allow us the use of the Dominion canals on the same terms as her own people.

The President says we have been deprived of the use of these canals, and if that be so then he had by this very act the right to stop the transit-bonded trade referred to by proclamation. He needed no more acts of Congress.

Third. If the transit trade, or rather the right to ship our fish across the Canadian territory, in bond, has been denied, as the President in his message said it was, as far back as 1886, then that right being provided and given us by this article of the treaty, the denial breaks the contract and the President was no longer bound by it and could have, for this and all the other reasons named, stopped the whole business long ago.

There is one wrong committed by the Dominion of Canada which the President does not refer to and which ought to be known and taken into consideration, and that is, that the Canadian authorities for all time in the past have refused to allow our vessels shipwrecked in her waters to be assisted by American appliances. It would seem that the law of humanity should control them and cause them to change this rule.

But not so, even when Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 gives the same right to our ships as her ships have in her waters and canals; yet she persistently refuses to allow our wrecking appliances to assist our ships in distress in her waters, and in one instance it is recorded where such refusal was had even though the wreck was in the Welland Canal, when American wrecking appliances could have in this instance been obtained in a few hours from Buffalo, 20 miles distant, the Canadian authorities compelled the wreck to wait until Canadian wrecking appliances came from Amherstburg, 300 miles away. In consequence, the cargo and vessel were damaged more than $4,000.

There are many instances of such wrongs to our commerce and shipping and rights, and all of record in the Treasury Department. We have since 1879 had on our statutes an act of Congress allowing the Canadians to come into our waters to care for their vessels and property in distress, but there has been and is to this day no reciprocity in this regard on their part.

For this wrong action and conduct the President ought to have retaliated under the act of March 3, 1887, long ago. Last winter the member of Parliament from Kingston introduced a bill in the Dominion Parliament to give our people the privilege to exercise this humane right to distressed vessels and sailors in Canadian waters, and that Parliament by actual vote defeated the bill.

Yet under all this notice, the President having under the act of March 3, 1887, the power, has not retaliated, and even in his message he does not call attention to this inhuman conduct and this great wrong upon our commerce and citizens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that all needed power was long ago in the hands of the President to stop the wrongs he speaks of and to stop those he has not spoken of. It must be left with the people of the United States to call the President and his party to an account for the continuance of these outrages. The American people long since clothed the President and his party with power to right each and every of these wrongs—wrongs which have been so conspicuous that the most humble citizen has known of them; wrongs the endurance of which has brought us in contempt with other nations because of our inactivity thereabout, and the President and the Democratic party must not think they will escape now the just condemnation which the people will visit upon servants so derelict of duty and so wanting in patriotism.

You may say in answer that you have been too busy in attempting to open the markets of our country to European products and cheap labor to give these matters contained in the message and which I have mentioned attention. You may say that you have been too busy in earnest effort for all these long months trying to make free trade between the United States and Canada for the benefit of the cheap labor and products of mill, furnace, and farm of that country, as illustrated by the resolution offered in the House of Representatives by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] on the 6th day of June last, which was as follows:

And provided further, That whenever the Dominion of Canada admits products, wares, and merchandise grown, produced, or manufactured in the United States free of duty, then the products, wares, and merchandise grown, produced, or manufactured in said Dominion of Canada shall be admitted free of duty.

You will find, however, that these excuses will not be accepted and the President and his party will on the first opportunity be taught by the people that a more rigid and careful attention to public business and less time spent in political management are demanded. The resolution I have quoted was presented by a member of this House who is a leader of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee that formulated the Mills bill. He is one of the advisers of the President, no doubt.

This resolution shows that the President and his party, two months ago, were willing, and in fact attempted to make the United States a great market for the cheap labor and products of Canada. At that time the President and his party wanted the United States to marry Canada financially.

Now the President wants legislation from Congress to cut off all even to the slightest intercourse with Canada, and the wrongs he gives as reasons for his wants are much older than the desire to wed Canada financially.

I leave the case with the thoughtful mind to render the judgment which must follow, that this message is but a desperate political move to retrieve political ground lost in pandering to an English financial policy which for a century has been, and I hope for another century will be, obnoxious to the sense and patriotism of the great masses of the American people.

____ ____,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
September 1, 1888.

During the delivery of Mr. NUTTING'S remarks the following interruptions occurred:

Mr. SCOTT. That was provided for in Article XXX of the treaty of 1871, and had been abrogated.

Mr. NUTTING. The law of 1873, in section 4, provides that whenever the Canadian Government shall fail or refuse to give us the right to use the canals which she has agreed to under Article XXVII then the President of the United States may retaliate against her by shutting off the transit trade, which was part by water and part by rail.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I will explain that to him in two minutes. The Revised Statutes——

Mr. NUTTING. You can reply to that in your own time. I have stated how that was and you can not deny it, nor can any other gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. I only call your attention to the statutes.

Mr. LIND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information. He stated that the Canadian Government was now entitled to use the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. If so, I would like to know under what statute or treaty?

Mr. NUTTING. Under the statute of the State of Michigan.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from California yield five minutes more?

Mr. MORROW. I will yield five minutes more and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. NUTTING. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] I will state that this right to use the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was first given by a statute of the State of Michigan, made after this treaty and in obedience to it, giving the use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal to the Canadian Government, as provided by Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871. When the United States Government became owner of the canal by purchase from the State of Michigan they took it with these rights in this shape.

Mr. LIND. Under what article of the treaty of 1871 was that done?

Mr. NUTTING. Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 provides that the St. Clair Flats Canal shall be used by the Canadian Government on the same terms that we use it, and that the United States would procure the use of State canals on the same terms, if possible; and when the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was purchased by the United States Government, then the United States was governed by Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871.

Mr. ROMEIS. I do not rise for the purpose of taking part in the debate on the merits of the bill, but I want to call the attention of the House to one fact which has not been mentioned in this debate, and that is the channel through which the commerce of the Lakes passes is exclusively in Canada. And if the second section of this bill is carried out and put in full operation it will, in my judgment and in that of many friends who have looked into it, be in the power of Canada to close up this great channel. It is exclusively in Canada, is so claimed by them and allowed by us. That is evidenced by the fact that there is an island there between the channel and the American shore on which the Canadian Government maintains the light-house. The American Government made a great mistake some years ago when, instead of improving Detroit River and making the channel through American waters, they extended this channel at an expenditure of thousands of dollars, and instead of putting it through American waters it was made through the Canadian waters. Canada can fill up this channel if she wants to, and I see no way that we could prevent her from doing so except by force. The American Government neglected to improve its own waters, but did improve those of Canada. In relation to the St. Clair Flats Canal, I can say that while sailing its lakes I was informed forty years ago that where it is now located was Canada waters.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, in coming to this question it would perhaps be well for the House to understand what is the proposition before them, and in order to explain that we must necessarily look to the contents of the treaties which have existed between Great Britain and her North American provinces and this country in reference to the fishery question. It will be remembered by those who heard the debate and those who are familiar with this question that the treaty of 1783, which was the treaty of peace, re-established in these provisions the right of American fishermen in common with Canadian fishermen in the waters of the Northern Atlantic jointly by the Dominion of Canada and the provinces of Great Britain. That was the last treaty upon this subject. We had no other law upon this subject until the agreement between the two governments in the treaty of 1818, which restricted the rights of American fishermen within 3 leagues of the shore to enter into Canadian ports for four specific purposes—for the purpose of shelter from the storms of the ocean; for the purpose of obtaining water and supplies, and these four restrictions remain now the right of the American fishermen since the rejection of the recent treaty by the Senate of the United States, made in 1888. Other treaties were made upon this subject that for a time suspended the operation of the treaty of 1818 and the first section thereof, and they are commonly known as the reciprocity treaties of 1854 and 1871. The reciprocity treaty of 1854 was terminated by limitation as to the time in which it should operate.

That remitted us back again upon the termination of the treaty of 1854, commonly known as the reciprocity treaty of that date; it remitted us back, so far as the fisheries were concerned, to the rights and privileges secured by the treaty of 1818, giving us the free entrance to the deep-water fisheries and the entrance to the inshore fisheries within 3 leagues of the Canadian shore for the purposes specified. That was the condition of affairs at the termination of the treaty of 1854. Matters remained in that condition after the expiration of that treaty and its abrogation until the treaty of 1871. The treaty of 1871 was adopted as another reciprocity treaty agreed upon between the two powers, and it conceded certain rights and privileges to American citizens and American fishermen.

The terms of that treaty of 1871, in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, granted certain rights to American fishermen. By the twenty-seventh article of that treaty we were to have free access to the canals running through Canada upon the same condition and with the same rights as Canadian citizens. That privilege was secured, I say, by Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871, and the denial of that privilege is referred to by the President in his message sent to the Congress of the United States after the rejection of the recent treaty of 1888, as one of the reasons why he believes that additional powers of retaliation should be vested in him. But it is not the only reason, nor, I may be permitted to say, the principal one. There was another article of that treaty, Article XXIX, which gave to the people of the United States certain rights of shipment of goods over Canadian railways and canals in bond, and gave correlative rights to the people of the British Dominion of Canada and of the Empire of Great Britain to transport in bond goods entering to the ports of the United States. Now the question arises as to whether or not the stipulations of Article XXIX have been abrogated, or whether that article is still in force.

But before I proceed to the consideration of that question I desire to call the attention of the House to what has been so often alluded to in this debate, namely, the retaliatory act, as it is termed, of 1887. That bill was introduced in the Senate of the United States, was passed by that body, came to the House and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The House Committee on Foreign Affairs reported back the retaliatory bill with an amendment, of which I will state the substance. I will not weary the House by reading the amendment, but it was to this effect: That power should be given to the President to retaliate against the innumerable wrongs that had been committed against American rights, even prior to the adoption of the treaty of 1871—for it is a remarkable fact that between 1869 and the date of the treaty of 1871 there were more flagrant and more numerous outrages committed upon American fishing vessels than during any other given period in the history of the country. That condition of things necessitated the treaty of 1871, which was negotiated during the administration of President Grant.

This Senate bill of 1887 came to the House, as I have said, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the committee reported it back to the House with an amendment to the effect that the powers of the President should be extended to restraining the shipment of goods in transit over the railways through our country, because of the denial by the Canadian authorities of the privileges to which American fishermen were entitled under the treaty of 1871. That was, in substance, the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and when it came to the House for the purpose of being discussed and acted upon, Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, who was a Republican member of the House committee, and a gentleman of fair dealing and open and magnanimous action so far as my observation extended during the period of our joint service here—Mr. Rice, in speaking of the bill which had been passed by the Senate and the amendment that was proposed used this language:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, this question has been stated by my friend from New York, and it has been stated clearly. The question is just this (I call attention to the distinct manner in which the question is stated)—the question is just this: By the treaty of 1818, made by this country at the heel of an unfortunate war, in which the greatest glory to the American flag was won by the fishermen of New England on the sea, certain rights were renounced by Americans which they had secured in the treaty of 1783, rights to certain inshore fisheries. Let the gentlemen of the House understand. No question is made of the right of American fishermen in the deep-sea fisheries. Those are not involved in this discussion; but by the treaty of 1818 we renounced certain rights with reference to the inshore fisheries, that is, fisheries within 3 miles of the Canadian and Newfoundland coasts; and in that treaty there was a proviso that American fishing vessels should not visit Canadian ports except, first, in stress of weather; second, to repair damages; third, for wood; and fourth, for water.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a clear, distinct, and positive statement by a gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber, who was at that time a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, as to what was the attitude of the case when the act of retaliation was passed by the Senate and sent to the House, referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and by that committee reported back to the House.

It was upon that that the debate grew up in this House as to whether or not this amendment put on by the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House should be added; that is, whether this additional power should be given to the President of the United States. Mr. Rice goes on further to say:

> If the Canadians can shut our vessels out of their ports, we can shut theirs out of our ports. We are under no treaty obligations to let them in. If they can shut our fishermen out of their ports, we can shut their fish out of ours.

It will be remembered that the amendment of the House referred to the question of excluding not alone the fish caught by Canadians and transshipped here, but to any other products that were brought here; and it included the power to interdict the transit of such products across our territory. In the debate on this subject at that time Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, the gentleman who addressed the House the other day on this question so strongly arraigning the President of the United States for the fact that he had not acted under the law of 1887, used this language, which I quote from page 2136 of the RECORD, proceedings of February 23, 1887:

> This can not be done by diplomacy, as the executive branch of our Government must by this time be convinced. The correspondence relating to this dispute has been conducted on the part of our Government with signal ability and in a true American spirit. The Secretary of State has in each instance vigorously protested against the flagrant outrages that have been committed against our citizens and our flag; and the communications addressed by Mr. Phelps to the British foreign secretary are models of statement and reasoning at once clear, forcible, and conclusive. But our representations have been wholly futile. No adequate reply has been vouchsafed, for certainly the curt and unsatisfactory responses we have received can not be dignified by that term.

This was the sentiment of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the spirit and temper in which the Secretary of State and our minister at the British court had presented this question to the consideration of the British Government.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I do not dispute to-day the statement the gentleman has read; it agrees substantially with what I put in my speech of the other day. But all that was anterior to the treaty.

Mr. HOOKER. This was in 1887, and was, of course, anterior to the treaty of 1888, which is what the gentleman means, I presume.

Mr. DAVIS. And also prior to the act of 1887.

Mr. HOOKER. I will refer also to the speech made at that time by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], a gentleman coming from a region of country directly affected by this fisheries question. I will not weary the House by reading all that I will incorporate in my remarks. I will read only this single passage:

> And on the same principle, so long as Canada singles out fish caught by fishing vessels of the United States and refuses to allow it to be landed in her ports from one of our fishing vessels authorized to touch and trade, for shipment in bond to the United States, or for any other commercial purpose, it is our duty to arm the President with authority to exclude Canadian fish from our territory. While the Senate bill gives authority to the President to exclude other than Canadian fishing vessels or fish products, yet it goes to this extent only, to arm the President with full authority in case Canada should hereafter extend the discrimination she is now making against American fishing vessels and fish to the vessels and other products of the United States.

The honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] also spoke when this act of 1887 was under consideration. He said:

> They did not propose to claim less than of old for the value of the inshore fisheries and even expected to claim repayment for the tariff duties paid on Canadian fish during the interval. That would have been an interesting commission! To have met to consider the value of the inshore fisheries which are practically worth nothing and not desired at any price by our fishermen, with the old $5,500,000 estimate of the value of the inshore fisheries staring them in the face—a sum we had to pay after that unlucky negotiation which resulted in the Halifax Commission.

Now, sir, that Halifax Commission grew out of the treaty of 1871, a treaty negotiated by the then President of the United States, General Grant, and a joint commission representing Great Britain and the United States agreed that for these privileges, which it is stated here were not worth $500,000, the American Government should pay to the British Government $5,500,000.

I now come to the vote upon this proposition, which will be found on page 2149 of the RECORD; and I will remark that the first aye-and-no vote was upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], which I will incorporate in my remarks. The amendment will be found on page 2149 of the RECORD of the Forty-ninth Congress; and upon it there were—yeas 137, nays 124.

> Add as section 3 the following:
> "That any vessel of foreign nationality or ownership, within the meaning of the term 'vessel' as defined in section 3 of the Revised Statutes, found engaged in taking fish of any kind within 3 marine miles of any of the marine coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of the United States, or within sea, lake, or river waters of the United States, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture, and to proceedings to enforce said forfeiture; and any person employed on or with such vessels found taking fish of any kind in such waters shall be liable to a fine of $50 for every such offense; and said penalty shall be a lien upon the vessel in connection with which such person is employed, to recover which penalty such vessel shall be subject to libel: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to affect any right or liberty granted by treaty or reciprocal agreement, or to affect any exclusive rights of a State to regulate fisheries within State jurisdiction: And provided further, That the penalties and forfeitures herein described may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary of the Treasury, when incurred without willful disregard of law, under such regulations and modes of ascertaining the facts as may seem to him advisable."
> The amendment was agreed to.
> The question then recurred on agreeing to the substitute as amended.
> The question having been taken,
> The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The noes seem to have it.
> Mr. BELMONT. I call for a division.

Mr. RICE. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 124, not voting 57; as follows:

So the bill as amended was passed.
On motion of Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.
The following additional pair was announced:
Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BOUTELLE.
Mr. MCADOO. I wish to state that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] has been unavoidably called away from the House. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.
The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.
Mr. BELMONT. I have been requested by several members to ask that they have leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this subject.
Mr. STEELE. I object.

So that it is shown that at that time it was conceded there was a necessity for clothing the President of the United States with the power with which he was clothed by the act of 1887.

It has been said that the President of the United States has been derelict in failing to exercise the power vested in him by the act of 1887. Why, sir, it must be well known to honorable gentlemen on the other side, and especially to a gentleman so familiar with the diplomatic history of the country as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], that at that very time and prior to that time—as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says in his remarks on that occasion, nine months prior to that time—we were negotiating or endeavoring to negotiate treaties with Great Britain to settle this question of the fisheries—to settle the question not alone as to the rights of American fishermen, but with reference to the wrongs and outrages which had been perpetrated upon them. And this is the reason in all probability why there was no exercise of the powers of the President. A further reason was that under the act of 1887 the power of retaliation was limited to the exclusion of Canadian vessels from entering the ports of the United States. It did not extend the power given under the treaty of 1871 to shipping goods in transit in bond across the continent, across the Canadian territory on the one side and across the territory of the United States on the other.

There was another discussion on the subject when this bill was passed, as I have stated, by an almost unanimous vote of this House, there being but a single vote in opposition to it. A subsequent debate arose on the same subject. When this measure went to the Senate of the United States the Senate of the United States disregarded the expression of the will of the immediate representatives of the people, expressed with a unanimity almost entire, with but one single vote against it; the Senate of the United States disagreed to the amendment of the House which had been adopted by a unanimous vote, save one, and sent the bill back to the House, and a committee of conference was ordered between the two Houses. After this bill had come back and been referred to the committee of conference and reported back respectively to the Senate and House, these very gentlemen on the other side who had voted unanimously, save one man, for the proposition as it left the House, when it came back from the Senate on the motion to recede from the amendment of the House to that bill which had been adopted with such unanimity when the question came up in the House, there was another discussion which I will not weary the House by reading any portion of, but on this motion to recede the vote was as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is now on receding from the amendment adopted by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 136, not voting 35; as follows:

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

And who voted for it? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] voted for it, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] voted for it, and every other gentleman on that side, nearly, voted for it, with ten or twelve members on this side voting for it, and that very amendment which had been made in the House by a unanimity almost entire was voted down by the action of the House. And the House receded from its amendment to the Senate bill, and we had to take the Senate bill as adopted by the Senate—the yeas 148, the nays 136.

So the motion to recede was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above. Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote, and Mr. REED moved to lay that on the table; and it was adopted—yeas 142, nays 132.

Thus we obtained the bill not as the House made it, but we obtained the bill as the Senate made it, rejecting the amendments that the House had inserted in it to make it effective.

Now, sir, a treaty is one thing. It is an agreement between two parties; two separate and independent parties are parties to the compact. Retaliation is quite another thing. It is the act of one party taken on his own responsibility. Retaliation in order to be effective must be thorough, and so thought the House when it made the amendment to the bill; but the Senate thought differently, and the Senate rejected the amendment of the House, and the result was the act of 1887 merely clothed the President with the power to deny to Canadian vessels and bottoms the right to enter the ports of the United States.

The President of the United States, after the failure of the recent treaty of 1888, sent his message to Congress. There was necessity for treaty agreement between this country and Great Britain. We can have no treaty with Canada; she is but a province of Great Britain, and to reach it we must treat with the imperial power of Great Britain. We can not make a treaty with Canada any more than Great Britain can make a treaty with one of the States of the Union. We were compelled to treat with the Empire of Great Britain in regard to this matter.

Now, the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain met in this city in 1888, and they agreed on a treaty relating to the rights of our fishermen in the waters upon our Northern borders.

It was a treaty considered for a long while, deliberated with great care, which was presented to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate of the United States rejected the treaty. Why? Upon what ground? The Senate of the United States is a co-ordinate department of the treaty-making power. No treaty can be made by the President of the United States except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and I repeat it was there rejected. Did they move to amend the treaty anywhere? No, sir. Did they propose to change it? No, sir. What did they say? They said the treaty did not go far enough; that it did not accomplish the purposes; in other words, that it did not cover the entire ground of dispute between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, as if there had ever been out of the entire twenty-seven treaties made with Great Britain since the treaty of peace after the Revolution, the treaty of 1783, more than two treaties which proposed to treat generally of the points of difference between the two Governments. Twenty-five treaties during all that period treated distinctly of other matters, leaving the fisheries matter and other great matters out of the question, and but two treaties, that of 1854 and 1871, related to the general subjects of difference between the two countries. With the exceptions of these two no treaty ever assumed or pretended to embrace all points of dispute between this country and Great Britain.

But, Mr. Speaker, the treaty was rejected by the Senate, and no effort was made to amend it. It was rejected by the Senate by a strict party vote, that sort of a party vote which the honorable ex-governor of Massachusetts, Mr. Rice, appealed to his friends, and appealed not in vain, to make upon the other side of the Chamber when the bill of 1887 was under discussion in the House, for Mr. Rice said then, and said truly, that that was no time to make a partisan issue, not a time for the consideration of partisan questions in connection with a subject of such vital importance, but that it was a great American question reaching throughout the length and breadth of the land, affecting the honor, the interests, the dignity, and the welfare of the entire American people; and appealed, as I say, not in vain that it should not be made a party question by his friends on the other side of the Chamber.

When this treaty was submitted, sir, to the Senate of the United States, they rejected it by a strict party vote. When the indications were that they would reject the treaty for the reason, as they said, that it did not sufficiently guard the interests of the American fishermen, the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] offered the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion by Mr. GRAY to amend Article XI by striking out all after the word "charge," in line 159 of the treaty, down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 160, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: And all United States fishing vessels shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to the trading vessels of the United States upon obtaining licenses for this purpose, which shall be granted to all United States fishing vessels, upon application, promptly and without charge.

Mr. HOOKER. What was the effect of the effort to amend by the Senator from Delaware? The amendment was voted down by the same strict party vote that had rejected the treaty itself, thus showing that it was the solemn determination of the American Senate that there should be no treaty with Great Britain to settle these great questions of difference which so vitally affected the honor and the interests of our country and that the party in control in the Senate was determined that there should be no treaty. It was not, therefore, because of anything that was in the treaty nor because of anything that was left out of it, for the friends of the treaty and those who were in favor of its ratification, in the interest of the preservation of American credit and American honor, voted to sustain this amendment; and had there been a desire to adopt the treaty there was an indication of an entire willingness on the part of those who were in favor of the treaty to amend it to conform to the wishes of the Senate. But it was voted down by the same strict party vote. It was determined that it should not be amended.

Now, before I come to the consideration of the message of President Cleveland and the action thereon in the House I shall ask the attention of the House for a few moments, because it is a matter of public record, and I have a right to allude to what occurred in general terms in the Senate as matters of public record without singling out individuals, but before that I recur to the treaty of 1871. That was the treaty, as I said before, which was inaugurated under the administration of President Grant, and I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read this clause from the message of President Grant, to show what his recommendations to the Congress of the United States were when he appealed to them on this same subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighborly acts toward our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend, by proclamation, the operation of the laws authorizing the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada; and further, should such an extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

Mr. HOOKER. Thus it will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that when the message of President Grant came to the House and Senate it proposed that very grant of power which the President of the United States now suggests shall be granted, nothing more, nothing less. It is true he uses general terms and does not refer to the question touching the railroads; but the message refers to all means of transportation, and if there be anything unusual in the remedy proposed by the message of President Cleveland, and a precedent is demanded, it may be found in this message the clause of which I have just caused to be read.

Now, sir, in reference to the treaty of 1871, the question has arisen as to whether or not the oft-referred-to article of that treaty, XXIX, which gave the mutual right to Canada and the United States to transport goods in bond across either country, which gave the right to American fishermen to ship their fish home through Canadian territory—whether or not this article has ceased to exist and is no longer in existence. Is it in existence? By the very terms of the treaty itself, sir, and by the very terms of that article, which begins—and I will not weary the House by reading the article—

For the period of time.

What period of time? The period of time so expressed, sir, in Article XXXIII of that treaty, and in that article we find what that period was to be. The articles of the treaty which referred to the rights of our fishermen in the fishing grounds were contained in that treaty in Articles XVIII to XXV and in Article XXX of the same treaty of 1871.

Neither of these articles from XXV, nor the thirtieth article, contains any provision with reference to the duration. Where, then, do we look to solve the question as to when this Article XXIX had been terminated? We find it expressed in Article XXXIII of the treaty of 1871. It says that for the period of ten years these regulations shall be in force contained in the articles from XVIII to XXV and XXX and for two years thereafter, notice having to be given two years before they are to be terminated.

That was the provision of Article XXXIII in that treaty of 1871. It referred to these articles from XVIII to XXV and Article XXX. It did not refer in terms to Article XXIX; but Article XXIX connects itself with these other articles. It is recited on its very face that the period of time is prescribed in Article XXXIII. One of the British negotiators in his speech in the British Parliament says as soon as the time arrived that treaty was abrogated. There is no question, therefore, that the Article XXIX limited its existence to the time designated in Article XXXIII and the other articles relating to the fishery question. It contained within itself stipulations for its own destruction. It stipulated that it should be in existence only for one period of time—ten years, and not for a further period—on giving notice for two years. It is conceded that the notice was given, and nobody questions it. Now, sir, the President of the United States having endeavored to secure a treaty with Great Britain in 1888, and our negotiators and the British negotiators having agreed upon this treaty in February of this year, that remained the condition until its final presentation and rejection by the Senate of the United States.

The President of the United States when that treaty was rejected asks the additional power embraced in the bill which has been presented and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and is now under consideration. As I have said, retaliation should be effective, should be thorough, should be complete. It is the giving of power, and there can be no danger of investing the President of the United States with the power that is here thought to be necessary, though the very gentlemen who are now opposing it on the ground that it is not necessary were the men who in 1887 voted in favor of the section contained in the House bill to the same effect, save one man. I am glad to learn and to hear that the denunciation here in their speeches by the gentlemen on the other side of the House of the present President of the United States is to be condoned for by receiving the unanimous vote, save one, of every member on the other side of this Chamber. These votes, I say, will be a handsome condonement for their opposition to the measure in their speeches.

The President of the United States was left where, then? The Senate had said, "We will not allow you to make a treaty with Great Britain upon this subject. We will refuse and reject your treaty. We will not even consent to the exercise of the constitutional power with which the Senate is invested to amend it, but will vote it down. We will vote down more than that; we will vote down every amendment which is proposed to perfect it." How was the President of the United States then left? He was left with the rights and interest and property of American citizens to protect. Negotiations had failed on account of the partisan vote of the Senate to allow any treaty stipulation with Great Britain to be entered into and failed for that reason alone. The President of the United States, not abandoning the fishermen whose rights had been outraged, sent a message, which we had read to us, on the subject of the termination of these rights and asked to have granted this additional power.

The President in that message, and it is a statement of the question which I defy any man here to assault or answer, said:

I recommend immediate legislative action conferring upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws and regulations permitting the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across or over the territory of the United States to or from Canada.

There need be no hesitation in suspending these laws, arising from the supposition that their continuation is secured by treaty obligations, for it seems quite plain that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, which was the only article incorporating such laws, terminated the 1st day of July, 1885.

The article itself declares that its provisions shall be in force "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty." Turning to Article XXXIII we find no mention of the twenty-ninth article, but only a provision that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall be passed by the legislative bodies of the different countries concerned, and that "they shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation, and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

It will be observed that the treaty of 1871 was not to go into effect until four legislative bodies had passed upon it, namely, the Congress of the United States, the Canadian Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain, and the Legislature of Prince Edward Island. These four legislative bodies enacted it. That was done prior to 1873, and the treaty was promulgated as being in force upon the passage of these legislative enactments by these four bodies which were necessary to put it into operation.

Then the President says:

I am of the opinion that the "term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," referred to in Article XXIX as the limit of its duration, means the period during which Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, commonly called "the fishery articles," should continue in force under the language of said Article XXXIII.

That the Joint High Commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood and intended the phrase is certain, for in a statement containing an account of their negotiations, prepared under their supervision and approved by them, we find the following entry on the subject:

"The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force."

In addition to this very satisfactory evidence supporting this construction of the language of Article XXIX, it will be found that the law passed by Congress to carry the treaty into effect furnishes conclusive proof of the correctness of such construction.

This law was passed March 1, 1873, and is entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries." After providing in its first and second sections for putting in operation Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty, the third section is devoted to Article XXIX, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth inclusive, and article thirtieth of said treaty shall remain in force according to the terms and conditions of article thirty-third of said treaty, all goods, wares and merchandise arriving, etc."

The remainder of the section follows the precise words of the stipulation on the part of the United States as contained in Article XXIX.

Now, sir, this is the message of the President which it is said is not authorized, and yet the honorable gentlemen upon the other side, as I understand, say that every man on that side save one intends to vote for this bill. Where, then, do you look for its defeat, gentlemen? Where do you look for the response to the speeches which you have made against it and which you so handsomely propose to atone for by your votes in its favor? Where is it that honorable gentlemen on the other side are looking for the defeat of this bill which proposes clothing the President with discretionary power to make retaliation effective? Is it expected to be achieved as it was in 1887 after gentlemen on that side of the House had voted for the bill of that year? Is the defeat expected at the other end of the Capitol, and is it expected to occur under like circumstances to those of 1887? Is the other branch of the legislative department of the Government, which is Republican in its majority, looked to to accomplish that feat which honorable gentlemen on the other side of this Hall will say by their votes ought not to be accomplished?

Sir, this proposition now made by the House is to clothe the President of the United States with the power to make retaliation effective. It was said by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] that this message went up like a rocket, that the President had concealed within his own bosom his convictions about the termination of the treaty of 1871, and that it was never revealed until he sent this message to the Congress of the United States calling for this additional power. Why, sir, the President was cognizant of the act of 1873 putting the treaty into operation; he was cognizant, as his message shows, of its termination; he was aware of the fact that we had given the notice; he was necessitated to occupy the position he did occupy because the Senate had refused to ratify the treaty which he had negotiated for the settlement of these questions. Sir, much has been said against the President of the United States in reference to this matter; much of abusive language has been used toward the President, and I was sorry to hear the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] say that the President was even pusillanimous in not enforcing the act of 1887. Sir, it would have been in bad taste for the President, while he was negotiating a treaty with Great Britain for the settlement of all these questions, to have attempted to enforce the act of 1887.

He was endeavoring to settle this whole controversy by treaty agreement; but, sir, the President of the United States—and when I speak of him I speak only as a humble public officer, occupying a representative position upon this floor. I hold no close relations to the President of the United States which authorize me to speak for him or to vindicate him, nor does he need it. But as a Representative I speak of the President as a public officer who has been clothed with the highest office of trust and honor within the gift of the American people. I speak of him as an American citizen coming from the bosom of the people, not trained in legislative schools, either State or national. When I had the honor to go as a member of the committee appointed to notify him of his nomination after the Chicago convention of 1884, and heard his speech in response to Hon. William Vilas, the chairman of our notifying committee, I listened with keen anxiety to hear what should be the first words that would fall from the lips of the man that was to be the future President of the United States.

The President, as I have said, had had none of the training of legislators such as the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] possess. He had sprung immediately from the people. He had never held a seat in a legislative body. But in that speech he spoke with so much prudence, with so much wisdom, that not even the opposition papers dared to say a word against it; and when, a few days afterwards, he came to write his letter of acceptance more formally not a line nor a syllable nor a letter in it was ever criticised. And when he came to send his first message to the Congress of the United States it came here as the document of a man skilled in the arts of statesmanship and exhibiting strong, sturdy American common sense. Every single sentiment that he has uttered, every act that he has done, has borne this stamp. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] said yesterday, "Oh, for an hour of Andrew Jackson or Ulysses Grant." Sir, you have a President who, in this matter, has exhibited the stern determination, the hardy iron courage of Jackson and the dogged perseverance of Grant in maintaining the honor and the dignity of the American name and the rights of the American citizen wherever they have been assailed. He stands impervious to the attacks of the wily diplomat who speaks with the devious language of diplomacy. He stands impervious to the coarser tirade of the politician who says that he has lacked the courage to do what his duty as an American citizen and an American President required. Wherever the President has been placed—I speak it not as a partisan; I thank God that I believe I utter the sentiment of every American citizen, whether he belongs to one party or another when I say that in whatever position the President of the United States has been placed he has always been equal to the emergencies of the occasion. [Applause.]

Sir, when he sat in that grand old institution of which I am myself proud to be a graduate—when he sat in that seat of learning at Cambridge when she celebrated her grand centenary, and the professors from old Cambridge in England had come over to honor the centenary of our Cambridge, and when he uttered his speech on that occasion and said, "I can not boast an alma mater as you gentlemen can, but I come as an American citizen imbued with the rights and interests and honor of my country to speak here as its President"—placed in that grand assembly amidst the savants of the Old World and the New, no man on that occasion spoke with clearer convictions, purer English, or sounder sense than Grover Cleveland, the President of the United States. And wherever else he has been called to speak or to act in vindication of the rights and interests and honor of the American name, he has been equal to the occasion. Is he deficient now because he sends in this message and says, "Defeated as diplomacy has been, defeated as negotiation has been, by the partisan vote of a Republican Senate, I yet do not give up the rights of American fishermen which the gentlemen on the other side have been eloquent in depicting; in vindication of their rights, in assertion of their privileges, in protection of their name, I insist that it is wisdom on the part of the Congress of the United States to invest the Executive with the power to make retaliation effective by stopping in transit all the goods belonging to the people of that Government, or a portion of that Government, which has treated our fishermen and other citizens with so much brutality and wrong." [Applause.]

I believe that this message, like every other utterance of the President of the United States, will, when stripped of the partisan abuse of the Senate and the partisan abuse of the House, receive the approval of his countrymen. I believe that there is a sense of right and justice, of fair dealing and manhood in the American heart—it beats stronger in the breast of no man than in that of the President of the United States. I believe there is in the American heart and the American mind that sentiment of fair and honest dealing toward a great ruler, who has been called to his high position by the votes of 60,000,000 of people, that will say to him: "We approve your course; we find in it nothing to which we object; we commend it." [Applause.]

Sir, I believe that that voice will come from all over this land; and it will be heard nowhere in louder and more resonant tones than on the coast of New England, washed by the long swell of the Atlantic, covering the very fishing grounds which this message was designed to give him the authority to protect; and that voice will come from where the hardy pioneer has built magnificent States of the Union around the glittering lakes of the West; and it will come from the slumberous savannas of my own flower-scented South, where the great Father of Waters, with his thousand tributaries, rolls in solemn silence to that golden goal of the West Indies, the Gulf of Mexico. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I listened yesterday to the great statesman and leader and dictator of the Democratic party, Mr. SCOTT, for three long hours, having listened to him an hour the day before. He addressed himself to this great question; and he informed us at the time he commenced his speech that it is a great and intricate question. I must confess, with all due respect to him, that as I listened I found myself with one of old asking involuntarily, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by multiplying words without knowledge?" But I know this feeling was unjust to him. From the close attention he received, and from the fact that the Postmaster-General, the confidential friend and representative of the President, sat by him through those four long hours with as close and patient attention and with as seraphic a look as ever devotee sat under the droppings of the sanctuary, I know that I was mistaken and that it was a great speech. Judge of my surprise—ay, my grief—when this morning, on picking up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I found that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had "withheld his remarks for revision." I say "surprise" because in those four long hours the gentleman stuck as closely to his manuscript as any gentleman it has ever been my privilege to listen to. He stuck as closely to it, to use a homely Western phrase, as a sick kitten to a hot jamb. [Laughter.]

I was also desirous of seeing this speech, because it was in the recollection of all of us how in the last week the gentleman from Pennsylvania has towered above everybody on his side and upon this side—how from one ocean to another his fame has spread. While your Breckinridges, your McCrearys, and your Crisps sing low, this gentleman, with his great ability, controls one day the Chief Executive and perhaps the Chief Executive him the next. Besides, I have very great respect for the gentleman because, in addition to his great ability and great knowledge, he has qualifications that most gentlemen have not. We all respect a man of ability; but when you couple intellectual gifts with $20,000,000, and when it passes around in low whispers that those twenty millions are to be shed like water in Pennsylvania and that she is to be turned upside down, that those twenty millions are to revolutionize the politics of the country, how could an humble man like myself do otherwise than look on with awe?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Such a thing sometimes secures a nomination for the Vice-Presidency, does it not?

Mr. CANNON. Furthermore, this same rumor on that side of the House and on this says that the same man, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, wants no little game like that, but is to be the successor of the President when the time comes. He is to wear the purple. I do not know what may happen; but having said this much by way of expressing my sorrow and surprise at not being able to read the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD, let me talk a little while about the matter before the House. I must confess that a man with no more learning than I have is apt to get lost between protocols and treaties and modus vivendis, I believe you call them, and all that sort of thing. What is the kernel of the fisheries controversy? What is the matter at issue?

WHAT HAS CANADA DONE TO OUR FISHERMEN, and what have we power to do for their protection? I thought I understood something about this in 1883, when, as a member of this House, I voted to terminate certain articles of the treaty of 1871. Those articles in substance gave Canada a free market for all her fish in the United States; we did not want to give her a free market any longer, and therefore we passed the act giving notice to terminate those articles of the treaty.

Canada did not like it, because she had enjoyed this free market under treaty for twelve years. It had been the source of great profit to her. The duties she should have paid on the fish shipped free to our markets would have amounted to $6,000,000. It never cheapened a pound of fish in all that twelve years of time to our people.

More than that, it discouraged our fishermen. We pay a larger wage to our fishermen, as we do to all our labor, than they do in Canada or anywhere else in the world. And to give our fishermen a better compensation we gave notice to terminate that portion of the treaty which admitted Canadian fish free.

More than that, there was a matter of public policy, namely, that we should foster our fishermen, the fisheries being a school for the education of the men who are to man our Navy in the time of trial and uphold the honor of the Government on the high seas. I thought we acted wisely then, and I think so now. But Canada did not like this, very naturally, as she had been getting this profit out of sending free fish from her fisheries to our market. Of course she did not like it. Well, what did she do? We thought we had an article in the treaty which remained in force, Article XXIX, which guarantied our fishermen certain rights. Canada gave notice she would not allow the exercise of those rights any longer.

What was the great right we wanted then and which our fishermen want now? There has been much talk about inshore fisheries and the 3-miles limit and headlands and all that sort of thing.

Now, as I understand, brought down to a point,

WE HAVE THE RIGHT IN COMMON WITH CANADA,

and we have had from the time of the colonies before the establishment of the United States and since the United States Government was organized, to fish in the waters off the shores of Canada and upon the Banks of Newfoundland. But if our fishermen are to profit by their work it is important when they have a catch that they should be enabled, not to sell the fish out of the possessions of the United States, but to go into a Canadian port and ship that catch of fish through the territory of Canada on her railways to our markets, paying the freight charge therefor. That is all we want. That is what we had. If Article XXIX is still in force, as I understand it, that is what we have yet. But Canada gave us notice in 1886, as the President said, that we should not be allowed to ship our fish longer through Canadian territory.

Mr. Speaker, here are we with sixty millions of people, great and strong, with magnificent interstate and foreign commerce, and Canada, our small brother, with scarcely five millions of people, undertakes to exercise the privileges which a little boy frequently undertakes to exercise to a burly giant—that is, to go up and kick him and spit in his face, thinking the latter can not afford to strike him because he is little. Canada said, "We have no free market for our fish in the United States, and we will annoy the fishermen of the United States by making it uncomfortable for them whenever they come into our ports or are driven in by stress of weather, until the United States will be glad to purchase fair and neighborly treatment, including the shipment of fish through their territory, by granting to us—Canada—a free market in the United States for Canadian fish."

What we want, what our fishermen want, or rather what they will want when the fishing season begins next year, is the right to enter Canadian ports when they have made a catch of fish and send it over the railroads of Canada into the United States to our own markets.

Now, much has been said about Article XXIX, whether it is in force or not. My own opinion is that Article XXIX has not been abrogated. If not, it covers the shipment of fish as desired under any fair construction of it.

But suppose it is abrogated? Suppose the President is right? Here we are for 3,000 miles alongside of each other, and if Canada will not let us ship fish upon her railways to our markets, we paying her a good price for carrying them, why, then, we have the power to retaliate in kind.

Now, what was the status on the 3d day of March, 1887,

WHEN WE PASSED THE SO-CALLED RETALIATION ACT?

Canada was then saying to us: "All right; if you do not let us have the markets of the United States as a free market for our fish we will annoy you all we can until you do allow it." Well, by and by the great big brother, the United States, got tired of being mistreated and said, "Here, we will stop this foolishness. We do not dislike you over there in Canada; we have lots of your people on this side, married and intermarried with ours, living alongside of each other, but we will give you notice that you have got to stop that." So we passed the retaliation act. You all recollect that. What does it do? It not only gives the President power in his discretion, but it makes it the duty of the President, if Canada mistreats our fishermen or our ships engaged in the fisheries or in trade in her ports, first, to issue a proclamation to shut out every pound of fish that Canada wants to send into our markets, whether it pays duty or not. Do you know what that amounts to? I have the statistics here, and I will give you the information in order that the question may be clearly understood.

Why last year Canada sent into the United States and sold to our people fish of the value of $3,500,000. So on the 3d day of March, 1887, when that act was passed, the President had the power to say, "Here, Canada, small boy, stop your foolishness, and if you do not stop you shall not send a pound of the $3,500,000 worth of fish into the United States."

Now that is not all, although I am satisfied that would have been sufficient if the President had acted, for Canada would drop very quick before any sort of action that would deprive her of a market for her fish; but we said we would make assurance doubly sure. We said, "We will give you, Mr. President, owned by Canadians, whether produced in Canada, or wherever they may be produced, from coming into the United States; we will close every port against you, at least we will give you, Mr. President, the power to do that." What did that amount to?

POWER TO STOP ALL GOODS COMING FROM CANADA,

Why in the same year I find from these same statistics that Canada sold to the United States and shipped to this country $36,000,000 worth of goods—all products belonging to her citizens. Now nobody ever supposed it would be necessary for the President to stop all that $36,000,000 worth of traffic. Why it would wipe the most valuable trade of Canada out absolutely. It is far more than one-third of all the trade she has got with foreign countries, and it is the very best trade she has got, for it is right here at her very doors. And we said, "Here, we are not going to have any foolishness; we know we have a man here in the White House who wants to retire the silver, we know we have a man there that will not pay out the surplus without being directed to do it by his party friends, Morrison and Randall, and the Republicans, under special action; we know we have a man there who will not buy the bonds, although the authority exists, unless Congress gives it special sanction in a concurrent resolution; so we said, as such a man is now President, we will have no mistake about it;" and we wrote another provision into the law giving this President

POWER TO CLOSE EVERY PORT ON OUR SEABOARD,

10,000 miles of shore line, and every port upon the great inland seas to every vessel of every kind from Canada.

What did that amount to? Why, take these same statistics of Canada that I have here and you find that Canada had last year of these ships over seven thousand of them, to the value of $36,000,000; the great majority of these ships—sailing vessels, schooners, steam-vessels, merchant marine or fishing vessels—the great majority of them engaged in commerce near our eastern border and upon the Great Lakes. And we gave in this law the President power to close all our ports against every one of these ships. Do you want any more power than that? There is not a man throughout the length and breadth of this country but knows if he had the power and would give notice that in one week's time he would use either one of these three powers we had given him the right to use unless our fishermen should receive fair treatment, that American fishermen would get the right to transship their fish across the Canadian territory. The great trouble is that the President has not exercised any one of the powers already given him by the law.

What did he do? He sits in the White House and writes a message which he sent in a week or two ago to Congress, stating that great outrages had been committed. When? Eighteen months or two years ago! Why did you not do something, Mr. President? Why did you not claim the indemnity? Why did you not use some of the powers conferred upon you by Congress? "I did not want to; I wanted to negotiate a treaty," the President replies. Well, he did negotiate a treaty. What was it? Boil it down and the substance of the treaty covering the real point at issue is that by and by we shall have the right to send our fish across the Canadian borders provided we will let Canada send her fish without duty into our markets. That is all there is of it, substantially. Going back substantially and re-enacting the abrogated clause of the treaty of 1871.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] said the other day that he did not like diplomacy or diplomats. He says that a "man who looks like a diplomat is a fool," and that a "real diplomat is a knave." Now, then, diplomats make this treaty on both sides. Just take this proposed treaty and from its provisions judge who was the fool and who was the knave, I say to my friend from Michigan. I think the treaty answers.

NOW THE PRESIDENT COMES WITH THIS MESSAGE AND SAYS:

"Here, I have waked up, and find that great outrages have been committed"—that everybody else knew about and had known about for two years past—and "now, within sixty days of an election, take notice: I want an act forthwith giving me power in addition to the powers that I have, namely, power to stop the shipment of foreign goods from other countries through the territory of the United States to and from Canada."

Who would suffer by that? Why, Canada has got her own routes. She has the St. Lawrence, and a railroad leading to her seacoast, her inter-colonial and trans-continental line.

Who would suffer? Why our roads that have been doing this trade. Are you going to give that power? That appears to be the general feeling. Why? Because Canada infracted or violated the twenty-ninth article of the treaty, and we have the right to do it. That is the legal ground upon which I will base my vote. Why, next? Because the President of this great big magnificent nation, that can protect herself and her citizens everywhere, has concluded not to use any of those powers he now has, but has concluded to scare Canada. We have adopted the Chinese policy, and that is to beat gongs. [Laughter.] So the President says, "I am going into this gong-beating business; give me another hammer. [Laughter.] That noise which is determined on, and gong-beating, maybe will scare Canada; if it does not scare Canada it may convince the voters of the United States I am a hero. Who knows?" Oh, for a man in the Presidential chair who would issue a proclamation saying to Canada, "Stop shipping your fish to any of our ports," and in forty-eight hours the whole question would be solved.

Now, I fear I will not have time to say some things I wanted to say. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] yesterday, about the close of his speech, came to talk about the former history and declarations of the Democratic party. He was so incautious as to refer to the contest about the

as it was styled. It was unfortunate for the gentleman, provided the Democracy "is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," to have made reference to that time. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? In 1844 Tyler, their President, had apostasized, the gallant Harry of the West was the Whig candidate, and the battle-cry was "Protection to American labor and industries." Everything bid fair for Clay's election. The Democracy raised the cry of "Texas and annexation!" and they raised the cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight!" I am speaking by the card. I hold in my hand the Democratic platform of that year. It reads as follows:

Resolved, That our title to the whole territory of Oregon is clear and that no portion of the same ought to be ceded to England or any other power; that the reoccupation of Oregon and the reannexation of Texas at the earliest practicable period are great American measures which this convention recommends to the cordial support of the Democracy of the Union.

They hurrahed for "Polk and annexation! and fifty-four forty or fight!" These were the magnificent rallying cries throughout the length and breadth of this country; and the gallant Harry of the West was defeated. What does history record? Thomas H. Benton, dealing with these matters, with his thirty years' service in the Senate, near the close of his life left us his "Thirty Years' View," in which he refers to this platform and these rallying cries of his party and states the historical fact that John C. Calhoun, the greatest man of his party then, and Tyler's Secretary of State, offered Great Britain to fix the boundary of Oregon on 49° right in the white heat of the canvass. It was secretly done, but it was done. Great Britain rejected it. Polk was elected and in his inaugural message (I wish I had time to read it) he gave notice that our title to the whole of Oregon up to 54° 40′ was unquestionable, and should be maintained to the last man and last dollar. That was on the 4th of March, 1845. Speaking further from history, on the 22d day of July, 1845, James K. Polk directed his Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, to secretly offer Great Britain 49° for the Oregon boundary. Great Britain declined. A little later he sent his first annual message to Congress, and again he stated that our title was indisputable to Oregon to 54° 40′ and should be maintained.

Soon after this there rose in the other Chamber Senator Haywood, of North Carolina, as Benton graphically records, the personal and party friend of James K. Polk, and he made a memorable speech, in which he sought to prepare the country for the settlement of the Oregon boundary upon the forty-ninth parallel. The debate went on for days and weeks. There were a few honest men in high place in the Democratic party—then. [Laughter.] I want to tell the truth; there were a few honest men, and now and then there was an Irishman among them who believed that the Democratic party was sincere in its platform of "Fifty-four forty or fight." That silver-tongued and magnificent man of Irish descent—I believe of Irish birth—who represented what was substantially my own native State of Indiana, Edward A. Hannegan, was in the Senate at that time, and he rose in his place and said what I will read, and much more, in reply to Senator Haywood, of North Carolina, who had advocated a settlement on the forty-ninth parallel, and intimated, or fairly stated, that the President was for it, notwithstanding his messages and pledges.

MR. HANNEGAN, AFTER SPEAKING OF THIS CLAIM, SAID:

Unless I grossly misunderstood Mr. Haywood, along with several friends around me, he said that the President had occasional stickings-in, parenthetically, to gratify what? The ultraisms of the country and of the public, whilst he reposed in the White House with no intention of carrying out these parenthetical stickings-in. In plain words he represents the President as parenthetically sticking in a few hollow and false words to cajole the ultraisms of the country. What is this but to charge upon the President conduct the most vile and infamous? If this allegation be true these intentions of the President must sooner or later come to light, and when brought to light what must follow but irretrievable disgrace? So long as one human eye remains to linger on the page of history the story of his abasement will be read, sending him and his name together to an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the hand of resurrection will never be able to drag him forth.

Mr. Mangum called Mr. Hannegan to order.

Mr. Haywood desired that he might be permitted to proceed, which he did, disclaiming all disrespect to Mr. Haywood, and concluded with saying that "so far as the whole tone, spirit, and meaning of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina are concerned, if they spoke the language of James K. Polk, then James K. Polk had spoken words of falsehood with the tongue of a serpent."

So said the eloquent Irishman from my own then State of Indiana. But that is not all. The discussion went on in both wings of the Capitol.

MR. DOUGLAS, THEN A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS, obtained the floor and made that memorable speech—if I had time I would read it—in which he outlined the future, in which he pointed to the fact that our title was without question clear up to fifty-four forty; that Great Britain did not then own and never had owned an inch of the territory in question; in which he said that that grasping Government was seeking to control the navigation of the Pacific and called attention to the islands of the Pacific; in which he said that the future would soon show that a road would pass across the continent making the shortest route between the East and Europe, and in which, from every point of view, he appealed to the Democratic party to stand by its pledges. Mr. Douglas had on that occasion almost the eye or the tongue of prophecy; but notwithstanding all these pledges the compromise was made on forty-nine. The trans-continental route has been constructed and if I understand the showing of Mr. Poor's Railroad Manual correctly a trans-continental route upon this very territory of and north of the parallel of forty-nine, known as the Canadian Pacific Railroad, has many owners—and perhaps some directors—who rise in this House as leaders of the Democratic party to denounce railroads in Canada. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

"Fifty-four forty or fight," the rallying-cry, was abandoned with shame and humiliation.

But what else was there in the first annual message of Mr. Polk? There was this: the revision of the tariff with a view to revenue as the object, with protection to home industry as the incident.

MR. POLK AS PRESIDENT RECOMMENDED

Well, the tariff was revised. The Mexican war on, Texas annexed, an empire north of the forty-ninth parallel given away forever; and the same power that exacted that sacrifice—Great Britain—came again and got from willing Democratic hands the Walker tariff of 1846, which bankrupted both capital and labor in the United States, and hindered the country in industrial progress a quarter of a century.

Then, in 1845 and 1846, hand in hand went concession of the territory of a great empire and concession of industrial rights. How, now? That was a tragedy. The action of this Administration is not so great a tragedy, because as yet not so successful, and I pray never will be. If Cleveland's policy is enacted into law it will indeed prove a tragedy, but some of his efforts smack of comedy. Think of it, to find the President of the United States giving away, in the treaty which he made, the right that the American fisherman has to protection along with the residue of the citizens of the country—making haste to give it away as a price for the right of shipping his catch of fish across Canadian territory to the markets of the United States. Concession again and free trade—free fish! The Ethiopian can not change his skin nor the leopard his spots; and the same may be said of the Democratic party. Concession and progress towards free trade is still its policy.

Mr. Speaker, there are other things I would have been glad to say if I had time. I have only glanced at the history of the country at the periods when it was guided and controlled and dominated by the Democratic party with its policy of revenue reform, and tariff for revenue only, and free trade always present, and its concession to strong governments always present, and its defiance of weak governments always present. I shall place in the RECORD an analysis of Article XXIX and the reciprocal rights that were granted under it. This has been prepared not by myself, but by a gentleman much more competent to prepare it, and to whom I give credit. So far on the speech I have made I think I can have a copyright, but on this part of it I have not. [Laughter]. One other thing before I sit down. Many instances have been given here where the present Administration claimed

ARTICLE XXIX OF THE TREATY OF 1871 WAS IN FORCE.

"Why," said the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT], speaking to my colleague [Mr. HITT] the other day, "listen to the protest of the Secretary of State touching these outrages;" and then he added, "you know the Secretary of State is the same thing as the President." Is he? I suppose so. If he is the same thing as the President, then he is so all the time, is he not? Then, Mr. President, you said in that letter of yours to Judge REAGAN that Article XXIX was in force, when we were about to enact the interstate-commerce law.

But this is not all. Gentlemen have talked by the hour about these treaties. Why, gentlemen, when you send goods in bond from a port of the United States through Canadian territory, there to stop or to pass back into the territory of the United States, those goods, in my opinion, are sent under a clause of Article XXIX in the treaty of 1871. Other gentlemen claim that it is under the law independently of that article. Well, I am only talking about this to show what that great, wise, patriotic, never-mistaken man, the President of the United States, says about it. You recollect that when the Canadian Pacific Railroad was completed the Pacific Steam-ship Company desired to transport goods from San Francisco to the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railroad across the continent. They wrote a letter first to the collector, saying: "We want to get into this trade;" and he sent it to the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Fairchild, Secretary of the Treasury, under date of September 4, 1886, replied, saying: "Yes, you can go into it." How? Under the laws and the treaty of Washington. That is what the President said, if he is responsible for what his Secretaries say.

But this is not all. Before the Pacific Steam-ship Company and the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company could carry goods in bond on that route, it was necessary to make another port of entry. Article XXIX provides that New York, Boston, and Portland shall constitute ports of entry, and such other places as the President in his discretion may designate. Well, after these companies got this route recognized, that did them no good until they could have San Francisco made a port of entry. I now read from the synopsis of the decisions of the Treasury Department, page 123. I here find San Francisco, Cal., designated as a port from which imported merchandise may be shipped in bond under the provisions of the treaty of Washington.

Now listen:

In pursuance of section 2866 of the Revised Statutes, the port of San Francisco is hereby designated as a port from which imported merchandise may be shipped in bond in transit through the United States to and from the British possessions in North America by such routes, etc.

Signed by whom?

C. S. Fairchild, Acting Secretary.

Mr. FARQUHAR. What is the date?

Mr. CANNON. March 3, 1887. What other name do we find here?

Approved. Grover Cleveland. March 12, 1887.

Mr. FARQUHAR. After the retaliation act was passed.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly, after the retaliation act was passed. Here we have the President stating that he approved this action under the treaty of Washington, under section 2866 of the Revised Statutes passed to put the twenty-ninth article in force. Gentlemen, within less than twelve months this quintessence of knowledge and wisdom, this man that doth tower like a Colossus above us all, turns a double somersault between sunrise and sunset, and under the wise manipulation and crafty suggestion of the twenty-times millionaire, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], comes down with that anathema maranatha against the infernal Canadian, and cries out, "Gore!" "Gore!" "Gore!" [Laughter and applause on Republican side.] He now says that Article XXIX is dead and has been dead since 1885. His position reminds me very much of the story we have heard. When postage-stamps first came into use, a little fellow who had never used one obtained a stamp and some one told him how to use it. He took it, spit on it, and then put it on the envelope. He was not sure whether that letter would ever get to its destination or not; so he just took his pencil and underneath the postage-stamp wrote, "Paid, if the blamed thing sticks." [Laughter.]

Ah, gentlemen, why this posturing? In 1844 you touched the patriotic heart of this country until every time you applied the finger it gave response and there went throughout the length and breadth of the country a patriotic awakening. It was "fifty-four forty or fight"—but you deceived and spit upon your promises. You broke the heart, politically speaking, of some great men of Irish descent and some of Irish birth, and of a majority of our people. We were, comparatively speaking, then but a small country, with few railroads, no telegraph, and few daily papers. You men who grew up out West as I did will remember how you would wait for the weekly paper, and how when it came you would read it through, including advertisements. [Laughter.] You fooled the people then and you betrayed and trampled under foot their rights, and future generations will turn and read your history in the light of your broken pledges and your bad faith, and will condemn you for it.

Too late, too late; you can not do it again. [Laughter.] In the first place you have not got a Jackson in the Presidential chair. Everybody knows that Cleveland is not a great warrior. It is all very well to talk about running a hot poker into the lion's mouth, but everybody understands that the present Chief Executive is not going to spill his blood in war. He will not have much longer to do it even if he wants to. [Laughter.]

The President issued his free-trade message last December and discarded everything else. The bill came in. The treaty came in. Thank God the treaty was defeated by the Republican Senate. You passed the Mills bill and your convention in St. Louis indorsed it, but there came like a clap of thunder in a clear sky disapprobation from the workshops and from the farms throughout the nation, and President Cleveland's knees smote together as Belshazzar's knees are supposed to. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Awaking as it were from a troublous dream he saw written on the wall "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Under the inspiration of that great man from Pennsylvania, Mr. SCOTT, he at once turned round and sent in this retaliation message.

Thank God it is the day of daily newspapers and good school-houses. Under a quarter of a century of Republican policy our people have been able to get farms and homes and to educate their children in the public schools. They have gone too far and you can no longer fool them. You might as well attempt to dip the Atlantic up with a tablespoon as to fool again the great mass of the people of this country by any such clap-trap methods as you resort to. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he is going to vote for this clap-trap?

Mr. CANNON. When it is to be a Chinese policy of terrifying the enemy by beating gongs rather than by using one tithe of the power in our hands, it is patriotic to give him one hammer more for his gong. [Laughter.]

I here insert the statement referred to, made by another and inserted at his request:

COMPARISON OF THE RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES GOVERNING SHIPMENTS OF GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE IN THE TRANSIT TRADE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE DOMINION OF CANADA AS PROVIDED IN ARTICLE XXIX OF THE TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN, DATED JUNE 17, 1871, COMMONLY KNOWN AS THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

I.

Transit through the territory of the United States to Canada.

Goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of the duties, through the territory of the United States under such rules, regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe.

The above is the first clause of the first paragraph of Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington.

Its immediate origin is to be found in section 5 of the act approved July 28, 1866 (14 Statutes at Large, page 328), and as incorporated in section 3005 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with this difference, that the act of Congress conferred the authority of designating ports of entry on the Secretary of the Treasury instead of on the President of the United States, and the authority for making transit rules and regulations is conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by the act of Congress while the article confers this authority broadly on the Government of the United States.

The regulations of the Treasury Department governing such transit shipments are embraced in articles 845 to 855, inclusive, General Regulations of 1884.

The following ports have been designated by the President of the United States pursuant to the foregoing authority in Article XXIX of the treaty:

Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Baltimore, Md.; Burlington, Vt.; Cape Vincent, N. Y.; Charlotte, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; Detroit, Mich.; Duluth, Minn.; Eastport, Me.; Fort Covington, N. Y.; Grosse Isle, Mich.; Island Pond, Vt.; Morristown, N. Y.; Milwaukee, Wis.; New York, N. Y.; Newport, Vt.; New Haven, Conn.; New Orleans, La.; Ogdensburgh, N. Y.; Oswego, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Port Huron, Mich.; Portland, Me.; Portland, Oregon; Port Townsend, Wash.; Richford, Vt.; Rouse's Point, N. Y.; St. Albans, Vt.; St. Vincent, Minn.; San Francisco, Cal.; Suspension Bridge, N. Y.; Vanceborough, Me.; Whitehall, N. Y.

The designation of San Francisco was made by the President March 12, 1887.

The following common carriers have been authorized since July 1, 1885, to transport merchandise in bond between the above designated ports and the Dominion of Canada:

The South Pacific Coast Steam-ship Company. Bond approved by the Secretary of the Treasury July 13, 1887.

The Port Huron, Sarnia and Duluth line of steamers. Bond approved September 26, 1887.

II.

[Corresponding privilege.]

Transit through the territory of Canada to the United States.

Goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe.

The above is substantially the first part of the second paragraph of Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington.

The privilege therein provided was discontinued by the Dominion of Canada as to the transportation of fish in 1866, as stated by the President and as appears by the following documents:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, June 14, 1886.

"SIR: The consul-general of the United States at Halifax communicated to me the information derived by him from the collector of customs at that port to the effect that American fishing vessels will not be permitted to land fish at that port of entry for transportation in bond across the province.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"Washington, July 10, 1886.

"SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I am in receipt of a report from the consul-general of the United States at Halifax, accompanied by sworn testimony stating that the Novelty, a duly registered merchant steam-vessel of the United States, has been denied the right to take in steam-coal or purchase ice or transship fish in bond to the United States at Pictou, Nova Scotia.

III.

Transit through the territory of the United States from Canada for export from ports of the United States.

Goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without payment of duties from Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America through the territory of the United States for export from the designated ports of the United States under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe.

The above is substantially the second part of the first paragraph of Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington. The regulations of the Treasury Department governing such transit shipments are specified in article 856 of the General Regulations of 1884.

It has been claimed that the above paragraph of the treaty of Washington had its origin in section 2 of the act approved June 27, 1864 (13 Statutes at Large, page 197), afterwards incorporated into section 3102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This is an error. Section 2 of the act of 1864 only provided for the sealing of cars and vessels so that they might proceed to their destination in the United States without inspection.

It has also been claimed that section 21 of the act, approved July 14, 1862 (12 Statutes at Large, page 559), afterwards incorporated into section 2971 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, was the original authority for the exportation of Canadian goods to foreign ports without payment of the duties. This is also an error. This section of the act of Congress is still in force and constitutes a part of the bonded warehouse system of the United States. The authority for an immediate exportation applies only to merchandise imported in vessels, in which case the importing vessel is considered the warehouse. In other cases the merchandise must go into warehouse before exportation.

V.

Transit through Canada from one port or place in the United States to another port or place in the United States.

Goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America to other places in the United States under such rules, and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe.

The above is substantially the first clause of the second provision of the second paragraph of Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington.

Its origin is found in section 6 of the act approved July 26, 1866 (14 Statutes at Large, page 329), and afterwards incorporated into section 3006 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The regulations of the Treasury Department governing such transit shipments are embraced in articles 836 to 843, inclusive, of the general regulations of 1884.

IV.

[Corresponding privilege.]

Transit through the territory of Canada from the United States for export from Canadian ports.

Goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without the payment of duties from the United States through Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America for export from ports in the said possessions under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of said possessions may from time to time prescribe.

The above is substantially the second clause of the second provision of the second paragraph of Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington.

VI.

[Corresponding privilege.]

Transit through the United States from one port or place in the Dominion of Canada to another port or place in the Dominion of Canada.

No corresponding reciprocal privilege of transit granted in favor of the railroads or other transportation companies of the United States by the treaty of Washington.

The Dominion Government has refused to allow grain produced in Manitoba to be transported over American railroads in bond to Montreal.

Mr. McCREARY. I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that I expected to move the previous question at 4 o'clock. Since that time this side has consumed about three hours more in debate than the other side, and it is proper I should say I will not move the previous question this afternoon at 4 o'clock. There are gentlemen on the other side who insist on speaking in order to equalize the time, and there are gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard. And I have conferred with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and other gentlemen, after which conference I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow at 4 o'clock the previous question be considered as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and also upon its passage. I will say in this connection that I would have been glad to take a vote this afternoon, but——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. YARDLEY. Yes, let us have it now. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he thinks at 4 o'clock to-morrow we will have converted the other man? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY. I hope so, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] is to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Kentucky for unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill shall be resumed on to-morrow——

Mr. HITT. After the reading of the Journal?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh! no; I object to that.

Mr. McCREARY. If we can resume consideration after the reading of the Journal we can take the vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will not agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill shall be resumed after to-day's session on to-morrow morning immediately after the hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that at 4 o'clock the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill and upon its passage, the entire time to be divided equally between the two sides. Is there objection?

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to fix the hour at 3 o'clock.

Mr. McCREARY. I would do so, but it would cut out six or seven gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard in ten-minute speeches.

Mr. HITT. There has been a great deal more time consumed on the other side—nearly three hours in excess of that consumed on this side, and I must insist that gentlemen who desire to be heard on our side shall be entitled to that much time to equalize the entire time consumed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the exact time consumed on each side since the debate begun. Up to this moment there have been occupied by the side on the right of the Chair four hours and five minutes, and by the side on the left of the Chair two hours and fifty-one minutes.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TAULBEE. I very much dislike to object to any request for unanimous consent, and have not been in the habit of doing it. But, sir, the situation as I understand it is about this: We have a special order for to-morrow, the consideration of the Private Calendar, a Calendar which has been neglected——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is in error as to that. Private business was dispensed with to-day but not fixed for to-morrow.

Mr. TAULBEE. The discussion of this measure, as I understand it, while it may have been and doubtless is interesting to each member of the House, has been proceeded with in a general way, and from the speeches to which I have been listening, while they have entertained me, yet I have seen no real good results, as far as the legislation of this House is concerned, which would warrant the consumption of the time thus taken up. If there is a single member on this floor who is unwilling to vote for the bill, I have been unable to ascertain it; and I want simply to make this observation, that I do not consider it good policy to proceed with the consumption of so much time in an unnecessary discussion of a measure to which there is no objection, and for which everybody is ready to vote, to the exclusion of other important measures which might be considered in that time.

Mr. YARDLEY. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Did the gentleman entertain that same opinion on yesterday?

Mr. TAULBEE. I have entertained the same opinion for some time.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not possible to take a vote on this at 3 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. McCREARY. We could not get through with it to-day.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I mean at 3 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr McCREARY. Oh, we will get through with the bill to-morrow.

Mr. HITT. Before consent is given to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, I desire to give notice that I shall claim an equal division of the time from the beginning of this discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the request of the gentleman from Kentucky contemplates an equal division of the time.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman from Kentucky coupled his request with a statement that certain gentlemen on that side wanted to be heard in ten-minute speeches, which seemed to contemplate a different arrangement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time will be equally divided from the beginning of the debate.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HARE. So far as I am concerned, I am as well informed on this subject as I hope to be by further discussion, and I object.

[Some time subsequently the objection of Mr. HARE was withdrawn.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 109) for the relief of Dr. F. O. St. Clair;

A bill (H. R. 649) for the relief of A. C. Bradford;
A bill (H. R. 988) for the relief of Joseph R. White; and
A bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. O'FERRALL for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. ERMENTROUT to withdraw from the file of the House papers in the case of Benj amin F Millard.

THE FISHERIES.

Mr. HITT. I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, my apology for taking up the time of the House on this occasion in reference to the pending question is that to a large extent it affects the business and commercial interests of the Northwest; and I desire in my remarks to briefly discuss what is commonly known as the "transit system," the shipment of goods in bond, and I propose to trace the growth of that system and to set forth its legal and treaty basis, and to specify what power the President has now in the premises and what power he seeks in the proposed bill and in his message heralding the same; and I shall append to my remarks in the RECORD a statement from President Van Horne, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, showing how seriously we would be crippled and injured by an interruption or suspension of our transit trade with Canada.

The St. Lawrence water system, consisting of the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes at the head of the same, extending as it does from the seaboard to the very heart of the continent—into the very center of our great zone of wheat production—constituted, in connection with the Erie Canal, prior to the inception of our great railroad system, the chief avenue and highway of commerce and transportation for the great tier of Northern and Northwestern States.

And this water system, nature's pathway, though surrounded and in part supplanted by a net-work of great trunk railway lines with numerous lateral feeders, still serves an indispensable and grand purpose, both in its earlier function as an artery of commerce and traffic and in its more recent but no less important function, that of a regulator and check to the greed and rapacity of our great railroads.

A glance at the map will show how our great east-and-west water system has drawn to it—side by side, as it were—our great east-and-west railway system; and the latter, in seeking a coigne of advantage with its earlier and other rival, the water system, has, for the purpose of being on a footing of equality, bid defiance to and knows no international boundary lines. The necessities of commerce developed through this railway system have brooked no artificial lines or artificial barrier, but have simply sought out and acquired the best and most direct routes to the seaboard.

Chicago, the southern peninsula of Michigan, and Northern and Central New York have for years relied upon and had the benefit of the Canadian Grand Trunk system, and to-day and for more than a year past Northern Michigan and Wisconsin, Minnesota and Dakota, and all that broad and fertile expanse west of the same, together with New York and all of the New England States, in a large measure, rely upon and get wonderful benefits from the "Soo" and a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway systems.

Chicago and the peninsula of Michigan hug New York through the Grand Trunk, and Minnesota and Dakota hug New England through the "Soo" and the Canadian Pacific. This heterodoxy of traffic—if I may coin the expression—has been accompanied by a heterodoxy of invested railway capital. Canadians have invested liberally in American railway lines, and Americans have perhaps to even a greater extent furnished financial aid or made investments in Canadian railways.

But commerce having those dual water and railway transportation systems—and I use the term "dual" in the sense of appertaining to both countries interchangeably—needed something more to promote and perfect traffic, some means by which the goods of one country could pass through the confines of the other back into the first without tariff toll, and with as little delay and hinderance as possible. Commerce was equal to the occasion. Years before there was any legislative or treaty warrant therefor, imperceptibly and by a sort of common-law method, the system of shipping goods in bond from one country through the other back into the first without the payment of the duty grew up, flourished, and expanded.

This system became known as the "transit" system, and is of a twofold character, one pertaining to domestic and the other to foreign merchandise. To distinguish between the two with as much brevity as possible, I shall hereafter in my remarks use the phrases "domestic transit trade," or "foreign transit trade," for the distinction is well defined, and is kept up in the treaty and legislation and proposed legislation to which I shall presently call your attention.

Precisely when this "transit" system arose or how long it existed prior to any legislation on the subject I have been unable to ascertain. The first legislative recognition and permission, so far as our country is concerned, and I am not aware that there was any earlier Canadian, is found in sections 5 and 6 of the act of July 28, 1866, and is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel, Texas, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That imported goods, wares, or merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the provinces or republic aforesaid, be transported from one port or place in the United States to another port or place therein, over the territory of said provinces or republic, by such routes, and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the goods, wares, and merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from the provinces or republic aforesaid, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty, or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States. (Chapter 298, page 328 and 329, 14 Statutes at Large.)

You will observe here that section 5 relates to the "foreign transit trade," and section 6 relates to the "domestic transit trade."

These provisions remained in force till, and were substantially incorporated in the following sections of, the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed, in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

The transit trade had only this ex parte legislative sanction. I call it ex parte because there was nothing in it binding on Canada prior to the treaty with Great Britain of May 8, 1871. That treaty was mainly devoted to the settlement of the fishery dispute, but Article XXIX, measured as to duration of time by Article XXXIII, duly recognized, confirmed, and continued by due international obligation the transit trade, both foreign and domestic, as it had before in practice existed. These articles are as follows:

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at any proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

ARTICLE XXXIII.

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty, shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislatnre of Prince Edward's Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward. (Volume 17, pages 872 and 873, Statutes at Large.)

This treaty was supplemented and put in operation by the legislative act of March 1, 1873, which I quote in full for the purpose of explaining and giving color to the points I propose to make on this subject. The act is as follows:

An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada, and the legislature of Prince Edward's Island have passed laws on their part to give full effect to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at the city of Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, as contained in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, he is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that he has such evidence, and thereupon, from the date of such proclamation, and so long as the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada or of Prince Edward's Island, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty.

SEC. 2. That whenever the colony of Newfoundland shall give its consent to the application of the stipulations and provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV of said treaty, inclusive, to that colony, and the legislature thereof, and the Imperial Parliament shall pass the necessary laws for that purpose, the above-enumerated articles, being the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, from and after the date of a proclamation by the President of the United States, declaring that he has satisfactory evidence that the said colony of Newfoundland has consented, in a due and proper manner, to have the provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, of the said treaty extended to it, and to allow the United States the full benefits of all the stipulations therein contained, and shall be so admitted free of duty, so long as the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty.

SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been, or may from time to time be, specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions, through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States.

SEC. 4. That from the date of the President's proclamation, authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States, upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same to another port or place within the territory of the United States, as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States: And provided further, That the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty: And provided further, That in case any export or other duty continues to be levied after the 16th day of June, 1872, on lumber or timber of any kind cut on that portion of the American territory, in the State of Maine, watered by the river St. John and its tributaries, and floated down the river to the sea, when the same is shipped to the United States from the province of New Brunswick, that then, and in that case the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend all rights of carrying provided for by this section for such period as such export or other duty may be levied.

SEC. 5. That this act thall not take effect until the 1st day of July, 1873, and shall not apply to any article of merchandise therein mentioned which shall be held in bond on that day by the customs officers of the United States.

Approved March 1, 1873.

Having thus briefly stated the common-law, statutory, and treaty basis of our "transit trade," I shall proceed to discuss for a few moments the attitude of the President on these matters as manifested in his recent message. After mildly criticising the rejection of the recent treaty by the Senate, he proceeds to insist that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, the "transit-trade" article, has been abrogated and terminated by notice pursuant to the provisions of Article XXXIII of the same treaty.

Is he right in this contention? Let us see. But while I shall here take issue with him, I desire to state before I proceed that I expect to vote for the proposed bill, because at this juncture it might be deemed unpatriotic not to do so, and because what is asked in the proposed bill is not, on being closely scanned, such a thunderbolt of Jove as some at first supposed it was.

That Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty of 1871 have been duly terminated by notice pursuant to Article XXXIII can not be questioned, but did that act operate, as the President contends, as an implied abrogation and termination of Article XXIX? This is precisely the issue presented. To understand the matter and as a key thereto it must be remembered that the executive department in the hands of President Arthur did not, as a matter of fact, of its own motion give this notice of termination. There was a precedent legislative request so to do, expressed in the following joint resolution of March 3, 1883:

Joint resolution providing for the termination of articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and article numbered XXX of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, concluded at Washington, May 8, 1871.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the judgment of Congress the provisions of Articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive and of Article XXX of the treaty between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, ought to be terminated at the earliest possible time, and be no longer in force; and to this end the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give notice to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the provisions of each and every of the articles aforesaid will terminate and be of no force on the expiration of two years next after the time of giving such notice.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give and communicate to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty such notice of such termination on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1883, or as soon thereafter as may be.

SEC. 3. That on and after the expiration of the two years' time required by said treaty, each and every of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and be of no force and effect, and that every department of the Government of the United States shall execute the laws of the United States (in the premises) in the same manner and to the same effect as if said articles had never been in force; and the act of Congress approved March 1, A. D. 1873, entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries," so far as it relates to the articles of said treaty so to be terminated shall be and stand repealed and be of no force on and after the time of the expiration of said two years.

Here was an express legislative mandate to terminate, and give notice of termination of, not Article XXIX, but Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] labored hard and long yesterday to give the history of the passage of this joint resolution, and as he stuck by his manuscript he overlooked the fact that the record of the proceedings of the passage of the joint resolution which he had read really argued him out of court, and clearly showed that there was no legislative purpose to abrogate Article XXIX. In the Senate and in the House when that joint resolution was under consideration, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] who opened this debate showed, the Senator from Minnesota and the member of the House from Minnesota were both anxious about it because this transit question affected the interests of Minnesota, and the question was put in both Chambers by them as to whether the abrogation of the fisheries articles would abrogate Article XXIX. The response was that it would not.

This legislative command President Arthur in terms obeyed to the very letter, and he did not go one step beyond it, as appears from the following concluding portion of his proclamation of January 31, 1885:

And whereas pursuant to the provisions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, due notice has been given to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty of the intention of the Government of the United States of America to terminate the above-recited articles—of the treaty in question, on the 1st day of July, 1885;

And whereas, pursuant to the terms of said treaty, and of the notice given thereunder by the Government of the United States of America to that of Her Britannic Majesty, the above-recited articles of the treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, will expire and terminate on the 1st day of July, 1885:

Now, therefore, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States of America, do hereby give public notice that Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXX, and XXXII, of the treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, will expire and terminate on the 1st day of July, 1885, and all citizens of the United States are hereby warned that none of the privileges secured by the above-recited articles of the treaty in question will exist after the 1st day of July next; all American fishermen should govern themselves accordingly.

Done at the city of Washington this 31st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1885, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and ninth.

[SEAL.] CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

By the President:

FREDK. T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Secretary of State.

Applying to this proclamation and to the joint resolution of March 3, 1883, the well-known rule of construction "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," it is clear that by enumerating Articles XVIII to XXV, and Article XXX, that none other were intended to be terminated, and that none other were in fact terminated. It would be a most violent presumption to hold that these acts, the joint resolution, the notice of termination, and the proclamation of termination operated by implication as an abrogation or termination of Article XXIX, especially as that, covering as it did our whole "transit trade," foreign and domestic, was of far greater moment and of far more vital importance to the commercial integrity of the country than the fishery articles.

While the total annual value of this fishery business of New England, which includes our Canadian fishery interests, is only a little over $14,000,000, as appears from the following statement:

The fisheries of the New England States are the most important. They engage 37,043 men, 2,066 vessels, 14,787 boats, and yield products to the value of $14,270,393. In this district the principal fishing points in order of importance are: Gloucester, New Bedford, the center of the whale fishery, Eastport, Boston, Provincetown, and Portland.

The foreign transit trade of Canada, as appears from Mr. Switzler's letter which I shall hereafter quote, is $33,692,676, while the railway freight alone of our domestic transit trade is from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 annually, according to the statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if I understood him correctly, for he it seems can get information from the Treasury Department which I can not.

Shortly after the President's message came in here I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury calling his attention to the figures given in the message, and asking him to give me information as to the amount of the transit trade, and I received a letter in reply from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, saying that he could give me the amount of the foreign transit trade, but as to the other he was unable to give me any information. And yet on the floor here yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] appeared armed with facts and figures purporting to be from the Treasury Department, which in some way he had obtained through the Treasury Department, showing the amount of the domestic transit trade by railway. I shall incorporate the letter of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in my remarks, so that gentlemen may see the treatment that has been accorded to me in comparison with the treatment accorded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The President is mistaken in the application he makes of Article XXXIII to Article XXIX when he says:

The article itself declares that its provisions shall be in force "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty." Turning to Article XXXIII we find no mention of the twenty-ninth article, but only a provision that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall be passed by the legislative bodies of the different countries concerned, and that "they shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation, and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

I am of the opinion that the "term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," referred to in Article XXIX as the limit of its duration, means the period during which Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, commonly called the "fishery articles," should continue in force under the language of said Article XXXIII.

The same phrase found in Article XXIX, to wit—

For the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty—is also found in Articles XVIII, XIX, XXI, and XXX. And it seems clear from the very language itself and from the context that Article XXXIII is only the "yardstick," or the "chronometer," if I may coin a phrase, that measures the time of continuance of Article XXIX, and that the ten years began to run as to this article when it did as to the other, and that two years' notice of termination is as requisite in abrogating this article as the others. The President's contention involves the violent presumption that Article XXIX can not exist after the fisheries articles have been terminated, that their life fixes the life of Article XXIX, and the further presumption that this, the most important article of all, required no notice at all of its termination, whereas the fisheries articles did. Manifestly every fair construction and every fair presumption is against the view now held by the President.

Why, scarcely eighteen months ago—in the second session Forty-ninth Congress—the administration retaliation bill—known as the Belmont bill, and about which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made so much ado yesterday—assumed in its very terms that Article XXIX was not abrogated. This is a part of the very language of section 2 of that bill:

And upon proof that the privileges secured by Article XXIX of the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 8th day of May, 1871, are denied as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at the ports of British North America, the President may also, by proclamation, forbid the exercise of the like privileges as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving in any ports of the United States.

Can there be any plainer admission than this?

And his own Secretary of State, no longer ago than last January, took a different view, as the following letter plainly shows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 7, 1887.

SIR: I had the honor to receive late yesterday afternoon your telegram asking to be informed "when was the treaty of Washington between the United States and the Dominion of Canada abrogated? When did its provisions cease to operate?"

The information you desire is found in the accompanying document, containing the correspondence which took place between this Department and the British minister in 1885, and the President's proclamation in regard to the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington.

This document is reprinted in full in the recently printed executive document in relation to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters (Executive Document No. 19, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pages 199-210), a copy of which is also inclosed herewith.

The treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain did not relate solely to the Canadian fisheries. Only the fishery articles thereof were abrogated, as enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 31, 1885. The remaining articles, comprising those which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, are still in force.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
United States Senate.

But the Administration did not at that time labor under the high political stress engendered by the rejection of the recent treaty.

The truth is that prior to the rejection of the recent treaty our executive department and our legislative department in both its branches never for a moment thought or harbored the idea, nor in action manifested, that Article XXIX was abrogated by notice or otherwise. Transit traffic has continued unquestioned since the abrogation of the fisheries articles as before.

Sir John Thompson, the Canadian minister of justice, entirely concurs with the views expressed by Secretary Bayard last January, as appears from the following statement, contained in a telegram, of the remarks made by Sir John Thompson at a recent meeting in the Province of Ontario, which I beg leave to quote:

TORONTO, August 30.

Five thousand persons assembled at Hagersville, Ont., yesterday to listen to political addresses from Sir Hector Langevin, minister of public works, and Sir John Thompson, minister of justice. The speeches of both ministers are pregnant with significance, being the first public utterances of the ministers of the government since President Cleveland's retaliatory threats.

Sir John Thompson said among other things:

The means of retaliation proposed was the withdrawal of the privilege to bond goods through the United States to Canada. This privilege was secured to them by Article XXIX of the Washington treaty, and it required two years' notice by the terms of that treaty before any article could be suspended. No notice of that kind had been given, and yet President Cleveland, regardless of the sacred obligations of the treaty, proposed to end this privilege without notice, and at a single stroke.

The truth of it is, and we might as well state it in plain terms without any circumlocution, that the President in his zeal to "un-English" himself before the American people has permitted himself, in a sort of mental hallucination, engendered no doubt by the stress of a political campaign, to recommend the unwarranted abrogation of a solemn international compact—a compact, too, that concerns one of the most important and momentous interests of the country, and from the abrogation of which we would suffer far more than our neighbor. And he asks our legislative sanction for such abrogation.

And we as legislators sitting here, not to be outdone in what has jocosely been termed "torturing the British lion," will no doubt after mild verbal protests complacently pass the President's little bill, for there is not so much in it after all, when closely examined.

If the President's contention that Article XXIX is abrogated is true, he has no occasion at all to come to Congress for relief, for as I shall show he has now far more power—and to some extent through his late Secretary of the Treasury has exercised the same—than he now asks in the proposed bill. By the act of March 3, 1873, which I have already quoted, he has the power to interdict completely and fully all transit trade on the Great Lakes and the rivers and canals connecting the same. This is the language of the power, full and ample:

And provided further, That the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty.

And the very power here granted was evoked and exercised by Secretary Manning, as appears from the following circular, which operated as a complete interdict of the lake transit trade:

CIRCULAR.

TERMINATION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES OF THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

[1885. Department No. 102. Division of Special Agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1885.

To collectors of customs:

Notice having been given by the proclamation of the President, dated January 31, 1885, of the abrogation of Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX of the treaty of Washington, collectors of customs are hereby notified that article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884, which is identical with article 19 of the regulations of March 30, 1875, made pursuant to Article XXX of said treaty, will cease to be in force from and after this date.

Shipments of merchandise in transit from one port or place within the territory of the United States to another by a route a part of which is by land carriage through the Dominion of Canada, and a part by the Great Lakes and the rivers connecting the same, or by the river St. Lawrence, in either British or American vessels, from ports on the northern frontier of the United States to ports on the Canadian frontier for transshipment to railway cars, and from points on the Canadian frontier, at the termini of railway transportation, to ports on the northern frontier of the United States, will hereafter be treated in all respects as ordinary importations from foreign contiguous territory.

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

For twenty-two days this order remained in force. For twenty-two days Secretary Manning had entirely suspended and abrogated all Canadian transit traffic on the Great Lakes. I presume that it was owing to commercial pressure that he afterwards modified this order and granted the Canadians the transit privilege in American bottoms, as I shall hereafter show. That was a case where the Administration has exercised far greater power than the mere power of collecting a toll of 20 cents a ton, as is proposed in this bill. That was a case of complete interdict of transit traffic.

Now, in the proposed bill all that is asked for, in case we are not allowed to use the Canadian canals on a footing of equality, is merely the privilege of collecting a toll from the Canadians for the use of our canals. Now, which smacks most of retaliation, the power to completely interdict or the power to merely collect a toll of 20 cents per ton?

Again, if Article XXIX is abrogated as claimed, then our transit trade, foreign and domestic, is remitted back for a legal basis to sections 3005 and 3006 of the Revised Statutes, already quoted; and these provisions are as regards the Canadian transit trade only permissive. There is nothing in them to prevent our Government from revoking the entire privilege, or charging it with new and additional burdens. Secretary Manning so understood the matter, as appears from the following circular:

CIRCULAR.

TRANSIT OF MERCHANDISE THROUGH THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

[1885. Department No. 116. Division of Special Agents.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 24, 1885.

To collectors and other officers of customs:

Under the authority contained in section 3006 of the Revised Statutes, imported merchandise, in bond or duty paid, and products and manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein over the territory of such provinces, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Therefore, so much of Circular No. 102 of this Department, dated the 2d instant, as rescinded article 844 of the Customs Regulations of 1884 is revoked, and said article is hereby amended in such manner as to restrict the transportation therein referred to to American vessels. Customs officers will be governed accordingly.

The salaries of officers stationed in Canada to supervise transshipment from vessels to cars, and vice versa, must be reimbursed to the Government by the transportation companies interested.

DANIEL MANNING, Secretary.

This circular, it will be observed, removes with conditions the interdict contained in the circular issued only twenty-two days earlier, which we have already quoted.

But waiving these considerations, the President has at least as much power as he now asks given him under the act of March 3, 1887, in respect to the Canadian transit trade. The following language of that act is potent and comprehensive enough:

And also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

In fact, this provision authorizes him to interdict the domestic transit trade of Canada—a matter of far more importance really than the foreign transit trade.

And this brings us to the question as to exactly what power the President asks for in the proposed bill. He asks for the privilege of collecting canal tolls, and he asks for the privilege of interdicting and cutting off the foreign transit trade of Canada. He could not touch the canal problem in a milder form, nor tamper with the transit trade at a less hurtful point. The total foreign transit trade of Canada for the year ending June 17, 1887, was, as appears from the following letter of the Commissioner of Statistics, Mr. Switzler, $33,692,676.

Mr. WEBER. Does not that which you have stated embrace the foreign merchandise for foreign countries which passes through and into the British possessions?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is what I call the foreign transit trade. I use the term "foreign transit" to embrace all of that traffic, both in and out, as distinguished from the trade which goes back and forth between this country and Canada.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 24th instant, you are respectfully informed that during the year ending June 30, 1887, the total value of foreign merchandise received from the British North American provinces for transit through the United States to foreign countries was $11,504,721; and the total value of foreign merchandise received from other foreign countries for transit through the United States to the British North American provinces was $22,187,955; aggregating $33,692,676.

I have no means of ascertaining the value of domestic merchandise shipped in bond from Eastern States to Western States, or from Western States to Eastern States, through the Dominion of Canada, such shipments being considered the same as coastwise, and therefore not included in any returns of the foreign commerce of the United States.

Merchandise imported from trans-Atlantic countries through the Dominion of Canada is credited in the import statements to the respective countries of exportation, and no account is taken of the transshipment through Canada.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The stoppage of the foreign transit trade of Canada through our borders could not but result more to our injury than Canada, at present. Boston and Portland are the winter ports of Canada, and the New England railways carry nearly all of her winter imports, while the Dominion railway system, extending from Quebec to the maritime provinces, fails to pay even operating expenses. Interdict this foreign transit trade as proposed and our ports and our railways would lose the benefit of all this traffic, while the ports of Halifax and St. John, together with the railway connecting them with Quebec, would flourish and prosper as never before. The interdict would make Canada entirely independent of us on that score and would be precisely just what her statesmen, imbued with the imperialism of Sir John Macdonald, would sigh for.

One year of interdict would forever transfer to Canada all that foreign transit trade now carried on through our borders. And pray who would be the gainer by all this? A few canal tolls and a little marrow put into the weakest part of the Canadian trans-continental railway system and the recuperation of the ports of Halifax and St. John are after all the only possible outcome and net result of the plan outlined in the ponderous message and accompanying bill. How tame and inconsequential it all seems when one looks beneath the glamour of the ponderous and solemn diplomatic phrases.

Aside from the recommendation to violate a solemn treaty obligation, all the President really asks for is this: Give me the right to collect canal tolls and give me the right to transfer forever to Canada all her foreign transit trade, amounting to over $33,000,000 annually, now carried on through our ports and our borders. If it is retaliation pure and simple the President wants, he has the power to a much fuller extent in the laws now in force. He can interdict entirely the use of our canals, and he can interdict entirely the domestic transit trade of Canada, and if Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is abrogated, as he claims, he can interdict the entire transit trade of Canada, both foreign and domestic, without any further legislation.

That State which was my home from childhood to manhood had a regiment in the late war which carried a live eagle perched on its banners into the midst of the fray. That bird of freedom, snuffing the air of war, would in the supreme hour of battle, when the din of arms was the loudest, flap his wings with very joy and keep a bold front to the enemy; and the men, looking up to that fearless bird, so emblematic of our strength and freedom, would, when the stress of battle was the most severe, draw an inspiration and zest therefrom which nerved them in the hour of combat, and which made them realize that they were, above all, the soldiers of a cause and country the noblest and grandest on the face of the earth.

So to-day, when the President attempts to carry aloft, perched on his banner, that bird of freedom before us and the American people, although we can see little or no occasion therefor, yet a glimpse of that bird, however slight or momentary, engenders in each bosom a spirit to do or dare all that the Republic may ask, whether right or wrong; and in this spirit do we acquiesce in yielding to the President what little he now asks, for we all "have a love for our land as if she were our daughter; her pipes in peace, her tomahawks in war."

PRESIDENT VAN HORNE'S STATEMENT AS TO THE EFFECT OF A SUSPENSION OF TRANSIT TRAFFIC.

W. C. Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific, and one of the best posted railway men on the American continent, is at the Ryan. It is commonly supposed that the legislation on the subject of non-intercourse with Canada is a matter of great interest to the Canadian Pacific, and Mr. Van Horne was seen last night and asked as to his views on the probable effect of this policy, if adopted, on the railway interests of the two countries. He said:

"I am acquainted with the railway situation on both sides of the international boundary and have figured this matter over very carefully, and I do not hesitate to say that the policy of non-intercourse between the United States and Canada would damage American railway interests between two and three dollars where it would injure Canadian interests one. In the first place take the American lines. All the Michigan roads would be heavily damaged. In New England all the lines would be seriously injured. The Central Vermont and the Boston and Maine systems, which include nearly all of the lines in Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire, about half of those in Massachusetts, and considerable part of those in Connecticut and Rhode Island, together with the Grand Trunk line across Maine to Portland, depend on the Canadian lines for an outlet, and this would be cut off.

"The same will be the case with the lines centering on the Niagara frontier, the Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburgh, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, and the Lehigh Valley, which now depend on the Grand Trunk for connections west. These lines would be forced to look to the notoriously illiberal Vanderbilt system for a western connection, or to the Erie, which is to a great extent a competitor for the very business it would be asked to take west over the lines it controls. The roads like the Wabash, running southwest from Detroit to St. Louis, Louisville, Cairo, and the Southwest, would suffer. The roads northwest of Chicago would be injured to the extent that the Grand Trunk affords them relief in low rates east. The two new lines running west from Sault Ste. Marie, the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Atlantic, and the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic, would be heavy losers of course; but understand that the carriage of flour and breadstuffs for export would not be hindered, as it does not go in bond.

"The American interests on the Great Lakes would also be damaged greatly. Since Secretary Manning's order of July, 1886, all the lake business from Duluth, Milwaukee, and Chicago for Eastern United States points going by the way of Sarnia, Collingwood, and other Canadian railroad ports has gone in American bottoms, and this would be knocked in the head. On the other side of the border the blow would fall rather heavily on the Grand Trunk line across the Ontario peninsula. But so far as the Canadian Pacific is concerned, the damage would be comparatively slight. There is no money for us in American freight anyway, and we could of course hold the passenger business, in which there is some money. We would be crippled in freight traffic to and from the new Sault Ste. Marie lines; that is about all. The balance to all this is found only in the benefits which would accrue to the New York Central, the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio, which, of course, would be considerable, but not to be compared with the injury wrought to other lines. So much for the transportation interests of the two countries. In regard to the effect on the prosperity of the United States and Canada, the former would be damaged twenty dollars to the latter's one.

"In the first place, there is all New England. At present they get their breadstuffs cheaper and they can supply the Western market with their manufactures by reason of the low rates growing out of Canadian competition. Under the policy of non-intercourse the New England States would be at the mercy of the Vanderbilt and other trunk-line interests. On the other hand, the people of the States west of the Detroit River, and particularly those west of the Great Lakes, are inestimably benefited by this same competition, which takes their products East and supplies their wants from the East at lower rates than would otherwise prevail. Any Western railroad man will say that the low rates east of Chicago that have prevailed so long are due almost entirely to the competition of the Grand Trunk. The trunk-line pools have in almost every case been broken by the Grand Trunk Railway.

"The benefit that this competition has been to the people of this country and the money it has saved them cannot be computed. On the Canadian side it is very different. The transfer of American goods benefits the country at large only in the measure that it takes so many more men to run the railroads. The fact of the matter is, such a move to injure Canada should have been made five or six years ago, before we had our line around Lake Superior. Then all goods for the Canadian Northwest had to be brought around by the way of Chicago or Duluth. The Canadian Northwest would then have practically been cut off from Eastern Canada by non-intercourse, but now the injury will all be on the other side. The policy proposed would effectually protect us against the competition of American lines in Manitoba."

Mr. SEYMOUR. Living as I do at the gateway of Superior, on the northern line of transit where two American railways connect with the Canadian system by an international bridge, representing a district rich in minerals, and whose future is intimately identified with the development of the railways connecting the Northwest with the East and traversing a shorter parallel than other American lines, I can not be indifferent to the modes of redress which have been proposed for the protection of American rights in the fishery controversy. The measures adopted by Congress and embodied in the law of 1887, and those asked for by the President in his message of August 23, 1888, desiring an extension of power for retaliatory purposes, are widely different.

The Northwest, situated remote from the seaboard, with its heavy and low-priced products, is interested in and dependent for prosperity upon short and cheap lines of transit. These are essential to its growth and development. Without them the producers and consumers of the Northwest are at the mercy of and must submit to the exactions of longer railway lines running south of the Great Lakes. Forcing the business of that section through these southern lines, additional to their natural freight traffic, would be injurious to Northern interests.

The extension of power asked for in the President's message for retaliatory purposes is stated by him in the following language:

I recommend immediate legislative action conferring upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws and regulations permitting the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across or over the territory of the United States to or from Canada.

If such authority were given it would result in like action on the part of the Canadian Government, prohibiting the passage of American goods through Canadian territory. This would close the international and intercolonial freight traffic through the two countries. Such course of action would injure, and be enforced largely at the expense of, the citizens of the Northwest, without correspondingly benefiting American fishermen.

It may be urged that this annulment of bonded privilege and transit would cause a serious injury to Canada. It would also be of great damage to the producers of the Northwest, who are in no way accountable for the inconveniences and injuries to which our fishermen are subjected. Such action, if adopted by our Government, would largely tend to strengthen and unify the Canadian Dominion. It would build up seaports now little used, and give business and prosperity to the Canadian trans-continental railway line.

Mutually Canada and the Northwest would suffer were this retaliatory measure adopted and long continued. Why, then, should it be tried? Is it the only or adequate retaliatory measure? The President asked for and urged it. The committee of the House have decided to abridge the powers sought for by reporting a bill which reads as follows:

It shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States in bond and without payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country from or to the British Dominions in Canada.

The power asked for by the President was authority to suspend the transit of the foreign and domestic commerce in bond through the United States to and from Canada. The authority authorized in the bill reported by the committee is the suspension of the transit of foreign commerce in bond through the United States to and from Canada. This bill, if enacted, will leave unhampered the transit of our domestic commerce and relieve the Northwest of otherwise anticipated burdens. It strips the retaliatory measures of their domestic sting and marks their force in a descending scale.

Congress, on March 3, 1887, offered and demanded that a measure, in its judgment adequate to the conditions and vexations with which our citizens were confronted, should be tried. Its language is plain and imperative, for the act declares "it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President;" yet with the same conditions confronting us for eighteen months, no executive action has been had. During the interval, a treaty has been proposed and rejected, and the question has assumed proportions and demanded unusual attention in the heat of a Presidential contest. What were the measures of redress embodied in the act of 1887 which the President deemed insufficient or inexpedient to exercise? The act declares:

It shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny to vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies) as the President shall deem proper, whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere, and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act.

The contest in this case applies exclusively to fish. It affects vessels engaged in fisheries needing supplies, requiring repairs, fishing in disputed limits, or fishermen requiring facilities for shipment of fish through Canadian territory to the United States. These are the questions which press for an early and just solution. It would seem that a remedy relating to Canadian fish could be found which would be adequate to the injury offered.

The amount in value of Canadian fish shipped to the United States during the year 1887 was $2,717,509, while the amount in value of fish shipped by the United States to Canada was only $57,920. If the President had tried the effect by proclamation of the prohibition of the importation of Canadian fish, it would have developed the fact whether such action would have been sufficient to have caused a termination of our controversy. Had a trial been given to the partial or full exercise of the powers granted in the act of March 3, 1887, it would have been an assurance of the desire of the President to co-operate with Congress in an endeavor to settle in accordance with powers granted, which in the judgment of Congress were adequate.

If Canadian fish had been excluded from our markets, Canadian vessels from our waters, which latter term would include our canals, the effect would very speedily have convinced the Dominion Government of its unneighborly, unjust, and narrow policy in the treatment of our fishermen, as well as the unjust discrimination against American vessels passing through Canadian canals. Whatever consequences may come, the rights of American citizens must be protected. Whatever powers may be necessary to grant, should be unhesitatingly given to vindicate the honor of the American name; but already authorized powers should not remain unexercised when American rights are disregarded, and when vexatious and unfriendly requirements are exacted.

The enforcement of the present law might long ere this have ended our disputes, terminated our wrongs, and paved the way for an honorable, adequate, and permanent treaty. Between the English speaking people of this continent there should be no lasting disputes, but a friendship and intercourse born of respect, and a determination to concede each other's rights should always exist. While, if disputes are continued and retaliatory measures are necessary they should be of the kind and partake of the nature of the subject-matter through which the injury comes.

Section 2 in the bill is eminently proper in view of the unfriendly action by the Canadian Government in allowing a rebate of tolls less 10 per cent. for vessels bound for Canadian ports, but without such disallowance for those unloading at American ports, though the act of 1887 provides in the discretion of the President against the use of American waters, which includes American canals, by Canadian vessels. The power vested in the act of 1887 is sufficient as a remedial measure for the protection of the rights of our vessel-men against the unjust discrimination of tolls by the Canadian Government in favor of vessels unloading at Canadian ports. Any action under this act would be necessarily prohibitory, but the bill under consideration authorizes the charging of tolls in the amount of 20 cents per ton, which would seem to be fully adequate to the purpose desired.

The discrimination will cease when the rebate is discontinued, but such action would not relieve our vessels from the charge of tolls, although Canadian vessels would be untaxed in United States canals. The Canadian would still be the gainer, as the treaty simply requires that each government shall treat each other's citizens in the use of canals alike subjecting them to the same charges or none, as the regulations of each government may determine. The United States canals are free. On the Canadian canals tolls are charged. The repeal of the rebate would increase the total of Canadian tolls, but would not reduce the amount to be paid by American vessels. Cumulating the interests of the Canadian Government and vessel-owners, the repeal of the rebate as affecting their joint profits might be justly characterized as damnum absque injuria, while the American vessel-owner would look in vain for an increase of his wealth or a decrease of his tolls. Yet treaty rights by such action would be respected and an equality of treatment of citizens by each country obtained.

The additional and different power asked for by the President, even so far as it is embodied in the bill now under consideration, will, I fear, if exercised, affect almost as injuriously our interests as those of Canada, while that granted in the act of 1887 I believe to be ample for retaliatory purposes pertaining more nearly to the subject-matter in dispute and sufficient for prevention in the future of vexations, annoyances, and injuries similar to those heretofore inflicted upon our fishermen.

Desirous to do nothing to antagonize the protection of American interests and the rights of American citizens, I trust the passage of the bill now before the House will meet the exigencies of the case, and that, whether the principle of retorsion or other retaliatory powers shall be exercised as a defensive measure in the continuation of the fishery controversy, the Canadian Government will learn that we are earnestly determined to maintain our rights, and only our rights, and that through such knowledge an amicable and just settlement will be finally obtained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this bill it is not necessary, I think, to go very deeply into the questions of treaty right and international obligation between ourselves and the Dominion of Canada. All that we need do is to consider that general principles ought to govern the conduct of the greatest and strongest republic in the world in carrying out what is popularly called a policy of retaliation, like that authorized by the act of March 3, 1887.

I doubt whether the mode of dealing with a foreign power which has done us a wrong or evinced an unfriendly disposition can ever be reduced to exact and definite rules. But the President in his recent message lays down one rule at least, which in my judgment is as accurately stated by him as it is inaccurately applied. After saying that the policy of national retaliation "manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest possible harm upon those who have injured us, with the least possible damage to ourselves," a proposition which is self-evident when applied to retaliation as it is when applied to actual war, the President goes on to say:

There is also an evident propriety as well as an invitation to moral support found in visiting upon the offending party the same measure or kind of treatment of which we complain, and as far as possible within the same lines.

That is well stated. The statement could hardly be improved. But when we come to look at the underlying reason of the rule laid down by the President it may raise a doubt whether he has been as accurate in the application as he has in the statement of the rule.

Why is it that we ought to visit upon the offending nation the same kind of treatment of which we complain? What "invitation to moral support," to use the exact language of the President, do we give by taking this course? The answer is plain. Unless the policy we enter upon is expected and intended to lead to actual war, and in that case we might as well declare war at once, our object should be to raise in the minds of the citizens of the offending power a lively sense of the injury they have inflicted on us rather than give rise to the impression, however erroneous, that we have unjustly inflicted a new injury upon them.

Accordingly where the acts of offense have proceeded from a particular portion of the offending nation or have arisen out of a desire to aggrandize a particular interest in that nation it is far better in the first instance, whatever may be required in a later stage of the proceeding, to choose such measures of redress as shall bear with the greatest weight upon those citizens of the offending nation who have given us the greatest cause of offense and bear with the least weight upon that part of the offending nation which has given us the least occasion to complain.

If we take the opposite course, it is hard to see how we can be said to give "an invitation to moral support" as the President says we ought to do. Suppose the Legislature of the State of Louisiana or the municipal authorities of the city of New Orleans were to adopt a course of conduct which gave offense to the citizens of a friendly foreign power like the Republic of France. What could be fairly said of the French Republic if, having the power to adopt a retaliatory policy which would bear heavily on the citizens of Louisiana and New Orleans, it were deliberately to adopt in the first instance a policy which positively benefited the offending State and city and bore with full weight upon the unoffending citizens of the State of Maine?

The citizens of Louisiana and New Orleans could hardly be expected to see the error of their ways by reason of the penalty inflicted on the citizens of Maine, while in the minds of the citizens of Maine the uppermost feeling would be indignation at the injury inflicted on them by France rather than a vicarious repentance on behalf of the citizens of Louisiana for the wrong done by them to the citizens of the French Republic.

Now, I believe that this illustration fairly applies to the particular line of policy which the President advises us to adopt.

It will be found, I think, that the principal offenders in this matter of the Canadian troubles have been the maritime provinces of the Dominion, while if the President's new suggestion of a retaliatory policy were adopted the chief sufferers therefrom would be the northwestern portions of the Dominion. The maritime provinces would suffer little or not at all, and would probably in the long run be positively benefited thereby.

What are the wrongful or unfriendly acts that we have suffered at the hands of Canada? They are, first, Dominion acts of Parliament; secondly, municipal acts or regulations of the maritime provinces or their municipalities; thirdly, oppressive, vexatious, or insulting conduct of local officials in the maritime provinces in the execution of laws and ordinances which, if administered in a friendly spirit, would perhaps give us little reason to complain.

As for the Dominion laws, I am aware that the whole Dominion is responsible for them. But I think it is worth noting that they are sometimes re-enactments by the Dominion of former statutes of the maritime provinces, and that they all, as well as the ordinances, regulations, and insulting and vexatious conduct of officials, before referred to, have for their object the benefit of the navigation and fishery interests of the maritime provinces. They are not inspired by nor do they benefit Ontario or Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, I do not forget that a part of the President's message and a part of the pending bill relate to a subject unconnected with the fisheries question and apparently unconnected with any maritime interest of the Dominion. I refer to the discrimination in rebates on tolls on the Canadian canals. I need not spend much time on this part of the subject. There is no difference of opinion as to the wrong or as to the proper remedy. The remedy should be promptly applied, if it can not be found under existing laws, in the general lines marked out by the pending bill.

But I wish to call attention to the fact that the purpose of these discriminating tolls or rebates when carefully considered will be found to be like the purpose of the other wrongful and unfriendly acts referred to. They are intended to strengthen the maritime cities and provinces at the expense of the northwestern parts of the Dominion. A toll imposed on all vessels passing the Welland Canal, and imposed only for the purpose of being rebated at Quebec or Montreal, is clearly intended to divert the export trade of the Northwest from the New York route to the St. Lawrence route. I can see how this would benefit Quebec and Montreal. I can see how it would benefit the navigation interests of the Canadian seaboard. What benefit the Canadian farmers of the Northwest get from it I can not see. It is an injury rather than a benefit to them.

But I wish to call attention especially to the unfriendly acts of the Dominion or its officials which are connected more or less directly with the Canadian fisheries. They all proceed, as I have said before, from a desire to benefit the maritime provinces of the Dominion, and a particular interest in those provinces. The Canadians of the Northwest can not derive any material benefit from them whatever.

I am perfectly aware that these injurious and offensive acts have generally been supported by the Dominion; and that we can if we choose call the Dominion to account for them. But if there is any meaning, as I think there is, in the rule laid down by the President in his message, and especially if there is any force, and I think there is, in the President's suggestion that we ought to give "an invitation to moral support," we ought first to adopt a policy which will injure most of all those Canadians who have most of all injured us, and for whose benefit all these vexatious and insulting measures have been taken against us. We shall get no moral support from any quarter by punishing the Canadians of the Northwest for the fault of the maritime provinces; still less if the measures we take confer a positive benefit upon the Canadian seaboard.

Just such a policy as is called for by the logic of that part of the President's message to which I have referred is provided for, and amply provided for, in the act of March 3, 1887, which the President has declined to put in force.

What does the President now propose? He proposes, as an appropriate remedy calculated to give "an invitation to moral support," that Congress confer upon him the power—

To suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws and regulations permitting the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across or over the territory of the United States to or from Canada.

I am aware that the pending bill gives him the power to suspend transit in bond "in whole or in part." But as it is altogether within his discretion, if the bill becomes a law, to say whether the suspension shall be partial or total, I think it worth noting that he has publicly declared his judgment to be that a total suspension of transit of goods in bond to and from Canada across the territory of the United States is the appropriate remedy for the wrongful or unfriendly acts done by or on behalf of the fishing interests of the Canadian seaboard.

I think it is proper to consider whether the measure proposed by the President is more appropriate than the exercise of the powers which all agree he derived from the act of last year.

It is a matter of no importance in this connection whether Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, providing for the reciprocal right of transporting goods in bond, was terminated with the fishery articles of the treaty, as the President argues, or has ceased to be binding on us because the other party to the treaty has ceased to regard it. I assume that that article does not stand in the way of the proposed legislation.

There is this to be said, however, of the effect of adopting the President's theory as to the termination of Article XXIX upon the relative position of the two parties to the existing controversy—it strengthens the Canadian position. If Article XXIX still remained in force after the termination of the fishery articles, the refusal of the Canadians thereafter to allow our fishermen to transship their catch for transportation in bond was the refusal of a treaty right. But if Article XXIX terminated in the way in which the President supposes it terminated, the refusal of the Canadians thereafter to permit the transshipment of fish was only the refusal to accord an international courtesy.

The Canadians, believing Article XXIX to be still in force, justified their refusal to give our fishermen the benefit of it on the ground that, although Article XXIX was not a fishery article, but a commercial article applicable to fishermen and to all others, yet when the fishery articles fell our fishermen were relegated for their rights to the treaty of 1818, and the fishery articles of the treaty of 1818 overrode, so far as American fishermen were concerned, the commercial article of a treaty made in 1871, more than fifty years later.

From this difficult and illogical position the Canadians are rescued by the new theory of the President, which they had never dreamed of till the other day. By just as much as the refusal to grant an international courtesy is a less serious grievance than the refusal to acknowledge a positive treaty right, by just so mush has the new-fangled theory of the President weakened the American and strengthened the Canadian position.

There is another question, raised elsewhere, which I do not care to go into at any length. It is the question whether after the issue of the President's proclamation pursuant to the proposed act the Canadians could not get all or nearly all of the advantages of transit of goods in bond by importing the goods into this country and immediately exporting them to Canada under section 2971 of the Revised Statutes. I do not care to go into that. I assume that the intended effect of the proclamation could not be evaded. The question remains, who would be most injured? I mean, what Canadians would be most injured by the adoption of this policy? It strikes me that the Canadians who would suffer most would be those who live farthest from the seaboard. Let any gentleman look at the map and answer the question for himself.

I believe this would be true even in the winter season, when the St. Lawrence is closed by ice. One not improbable result would be an increase of the business of the Inter-Colonial Railway and a great development of the port of Halifax. Halifax would take the place of Boston or Portland as the winter port of Montreal, just as it would take the place of New York and Baltimore as the winter port of Ontario and Manitoba. To injure Ontario and Manitoba, of whom we have not complained, and at the same time to build up the prosperity of Halifax, the center of the fishing interest, which is responsible for the whole trouble, would be a stroke of policy almost too grotesque for "Pinafore."

Besides, the St. Lawrence River is not closed with ice all the year round. How would it be in summer? If the enormous traffic which now passes to and from Canada across the United States during the summer months were to be transferred from the New York, Boston, and Portland routes to the St. Lawrence River route, Montreal would be benefited, the Canadian Pacific Railway would be benefited, the the navigation interests of the Canadian seaboard would be benefited, while the citizens of Ontario and Manitoba, who have least of all offended us, would pay the largest share of the increased cost of transportation. As to the loss to be borne by the people of the United States, who, according to the theory of the interstate-commerce law, would have to pay higher local freight rates to make good the loss incurred by American railways in their through business to and from Canada, it is a matter which the President would undoubtedly take into consideration. I do not care to go into it now.

Another thing. The policy indicated in the President's message would, if thoroughly carried out, add to the political strength of Canada. It would tend to consolidate the Dominion. Let gentlemen look at the map of North America, and see how the settled parts of Canada stretch like a narrow ribbon along our northern frontier. Let them consider what is the main cause of political weakness in a nation situated as Canada is.

I believe it is the facility of commercial intercourse between the western parts of the Dominion and the United States, as compared with the facility of commercial intercourse between the western and eastern parts of the Dominion.

I believe the far-sighted statesmen of the Dominion and of Great Britain see this clearly. The remedy they propose is to turn the trade of the Northwest into the St. Lawrence River route. What else would justify the enormous expense at which the Canadian canals have been improved and enlarged? What else would justify the enormous subsidy granted to the Canadian Pacific?

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not long ago that the Dominion laid a heavy hand on the people of Manitoba, to prevent them from building at their own expense a short railway to make connection with the railway system of the United States. It seemed a brutal measure, but it was a wise one from the point of view of Canadian statesmen. It could be justified only by the political necessity of consolidating the Dominion. The attempt failed. Would it not be wonderful if this Canadian and British policy, so beneficial to the Dominion as a political power, so beneficial to the maritime provinces in particular, were after repeated failures to succeed at last by the act of the American people, irritated by the unjust and unfriendly conduct of that very part of the Dominion which would get the greatest benefit from the consolidation policy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the President will consider these things once more. I believe his Cabinet officers, who, according to popular rumor, were not much consulted in the preparation of his recent message, will advise him that according to the logic of the message itself he is bound to exercise first of all some of the powers conferred upon him by the act of March 3, 1887. The additional power conferred upon him by this pending bill he must hold in reserve.

I will not do the President the injustice to suppose that he will exercise the vast powers conferred upon him by the act of last year and by the pending bill without great deliberation. As for his recent message, I believe it was hastily prepared and hastily issued. There is a suspicion on both sides of the Atlantic that it was issued by command of a political committee, anxious to persuade a portion of our people that the Administration is after all not a British administration in disguise. If that is so, it proves, not that the President will be reckless, but that the national Democratic committee is desperate.

It is quite possible that the occasion for putting in execution the powers conferred on the Executive by this bill will not arise till after a new administration comes in. The contingency on which these powers are to be exercised is likely to arise, I understand, only during the fishing season. The season for this year is nearly over. The passage of this bill at this time may simply have the effect of adding a new question in the impending Presidential campaign. We have added new powers to the Presidential office, leaving the people to decide which party and which candidate shall be trusted with the execution of them.

So far as the present Administration is concerned, the question will not turn on a message issued by the President within two months of the election of his successor. It will turn on his foreign policy as a whole during his entire term. If in its relation to foreign affairs his administration has been on the whole a distinguished success, it will be a fair argument, so far as it goes, in favor of intrusting to his hands these great powers during a second term. If, on the other hand, his administration of foreign affairs has been on the whole a failure, or if the mismanagement of the fishery question by this present Administration or the position he takes in his message is likely to handicap his future efforts to bring the question to a peaceful and honorable solution, there will be one argument the more in favor of electing General Harrison to succeed him.

At all events, Mr. Speaker, the pending bill is likely to pass the House by a large majority. Many will vote for it under protest. They know it is unnecessary. They feel that the policy outlined in it may be unwise, but they are unwilling to vote against it. They are reluctant even to seem to oppose the grant of additional power, however unnecessary, when asked for in a public message, in which the President declares that he stands in presence of a difficulty with a foreign power and needs additional legislation in order to maintain the interests or the honor of the United States.

If such additional power were really necessary, it would be granted, not under protest, but cordially and without stint. It would be granted not merely to strengthen the hands of President Cleveland in the pending controversy about Canadian fisheries; it would be granted to strengthen the hands of all the Presidents of the United States that shall hereafter hold office in all the controversies that may hereafter arise with any foreign power.

Our desire is to show to all foreign nations that although the President of the United States is elected only for a term of four years, although he is elected as the candidate of a political party and is opposed by another political party, although his policy, foreign and domestic, will be searchingly criticised up to the very end of his term, yet whenever he stands in presence of a difficulty with a foreign power and really needs additional legislation to enable him to deal with it, he will receive the earnest and hearty support even of those who doubt the wisdom of his management and confidently expect within two months to defeat his re-election.

Mr. HITT. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk and ask to have read an amendment which I wish to offer to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information, but can not be offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 2 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States be temporarily suspended during the present President's term of office wherein it provides that the President shall make treaties by and with the consent of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may offer this for information.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I offer that amendment, not with the hope or belief that it will be adopted——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the House has already adopted an order by which the previous question is ordered on the bill, after the debate shall be concluded upon it, and no provision is made for amendments.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I was not aware of that fact.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment in order to show the position in which our worthy President has placed himself. I take the ground, sir, that the President had no right to enter into negotiations whatever with Great Britain in regard to the fisheries question.

Mr. CARUTH. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to have that amendment again reported?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Well, the gentleman can read it for himself after I am through.

Mr. CARUTH. We would like to hear it read now, if it is to be the basis of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Very well, let it be again read.

The amendment was read at length.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. That is just the position that our President has placed himself in. He has clearly stepped outside of the Constitution.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to interrupt the gentleman to ask if the paper which has just been read at the desk purports to be an amendment sent up for consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been read for information. The Chair has stated that the amendment could not be offered.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I sent it for the purpose of showing the House the position that the President of the United States has placed himself in. He has taken upon himself the right and arrogated to himself the power of both Houses of Congress in treating of the affairs of this Government in connection with our foreign relations. He has usurped the power which belongs under the Constitution to the President acting by and with the advice of the Senate. The only question now involved is whether he had not power enough already granted to him by the laws of Congress to enforce the act which he now claims he wants to enforce. He claims that he has not sufficient power to bring the Canadians to terms and enforce his demands that justice shall be done to our seamen, and that additional powers are required, which power he requests, and that he shall have the right to interfere with railroad communication in bonded goods.

We all know that this will affect our own people a great deal more than it will affect the Canadians, for the reason that these railroads are owned principally by Americans; their termini are in American cities, and in consequence the Americans will be the greater sufferers. He had the power to carry out all the enactments of Congress, which power had been placed in his hands over eighteen months ago, and if he had done so there would have been no occasion to come here now and ask additional legislation. I am free to say, when it comes at this particular time for this alleged purpose, that there is an object in view behind it which has a greater and deeper significance than his pure mindedness would lead us to imagine in the claim that he is looking after the interests of the people. His object is in looking after the interests of the election; and had this document of his been denominated, or designated rather, as a campaign document in place of a President's message to the Congress of the United States, it had been far more properly termed, because that is what it is.

It is simply a campaign document to destroy the bad effect that his first campaign document—document No. 1—had on the people of this country. That is his tariff document. Gentlemen on the other side, and the President too, have realized the effects that his first document has had on the public mind. The Irish vote which he attempts to control by the present document was turned away from him in consequence of the tariff measure that he proposed. That is clearly apparent to all thinking people. And furthermore, he found he had lost their support in consequence of the method he took to negotiate a treaty with a power that was to some extent their enemy. The method he adopted was not satisfactory to the Irish people in that respect; and and in order to overcome, if he possibly can, the bad effects of that effort, he sends this message to this body. But I can assure him, Mr. Speaker, that he is too late.

The Irish vote in this country is not going to be attracted in any such manner as that. No one, I think, has a deeper sympathy than I have, and no one would more gladly strengthen the hands of the President if he were in earnest in helping the Irish people. But he is not. His object is simply to bring them back into the fold of the Democratic party, so as to have their support in the next election.

The President, in his first message, stated that there was no other question before the people but that of the tariff. He said that was the most important and paramount question to this nation. Did he not stop to think that this very question which he refers to now was in existence then?

This question of the fisheries was not settled, and yet he did not in his message say one word about it. Was he not also aware there were other great national questions to be solved besides the tariff? It seems not. The tariff question was sprung on this country as a key to the campaign, and upon its revision he expected to carry the vote of the people and secure his re-election. The President has made a great many mistakes and this fishery message is one of them. The tariff message was another; and the return of the rebel flags another. I am sure the people of the North would gladly have agreed to their return, and this Congress would have determined to return the flags to the people of the South, because they have no ill feeling towards the people of the South, but for the manner of the President in so arrogantly determining that question himself without coming to Congress for instructions.

That is the situation in this case also. He has ignored the Senate. He has undertaken to enter into a treaty with a foreign power without consulting the Senate; when the Constitution clearly provides that he shall not make a treaty with a foreign power unless "with the advice and consent of the Senate." He has undertaken to do that on his own account; and now when he finds that he has got the worst of it he comes back to this House in order to get authority from the people to do—what; to do that which he had power enough to do in the first place.

He says in his message:

> These considerations lead me at this time to invoke the aid and counsel of the Congress and its support in such a further grant of power as seems to me necessary and desirable to render effective the policy I have indicated.

Now, what more effective remedies could he have had than those he already had? If he had stopped the supplies of Canadian fish from coming into this country, as he could have done in one day after the act had passed Congress and he had signed it, it would have been the best course he could have adopted. He could have issued his proclamation then and stopped the Canadian fish from coming in here, and that would have brought them to terms; and if it did not, then he could have issued his proclamation prohibiting intercourse between the Canadas and this country. That is where he is at fault and where he has made the mistake. What would you think, for instance, if a general in any army when sent to do a certain thing and to attack the enemy in a certain position should return and say to his superior he did not have force enough? He would simply be dismissed or superseded. This is exactly the position of the President. It was his duty to enforce what power he had from Congress, and then if he had not enough it was his duty to come here and ask for more power to bring the Canadians to terms. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is an extraordinary measure, and while I do not feel entirely justified in withholding my vote from it I think we should not lose sight of the fact that it is a measure of extraordinary character. The Constitution wisely placed in Congress the powers over the subject that are now sought to be placed in the hands of the Executive. Among these are the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations;" the power to make reprisals; to "grant letters of marque and reprisal;" and none of these powers were by the Constitution placed in the hands of the Executive.

It is true Congress may authorize the Executive to exercise these powers, and it is proper that it should do so when the specific occasion has arisen to exercise them. But Congress should not, except for the most urgent reasons, grant a general and continuing authority to the Executive, for such an act would amount to an abdication of its own power. The fact that certain powers resting in Congress were given to the Executive by the act of 1887 should have been regarded by him as a legislative declaration that if the wrongs complained of were not remedied the Executive should exercise the power of retaliation and should have been acted on by him as such, but we have not a particle of evidence that there has been a single protest during all that time against these wrongs and outrages since the power to enforce the requirements of the fisherman. It seems somewhat remarkable that so suddenly, after so long a period of absolute neglect and disregard, and after they had been pointed out as they have been done repeatedly both by the gentleman from New York (Mr. NUTTING in his speech three months since) and by the gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, and others, the President should now so suddenly discover that we have suffered so greatly as to demand such vast powers of retaliation as would virtually place the entire commerce of the Northwest subject to the whim of a single man. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] seeks to excuse the Executive for his failure to exercise his powers under the act of 1887 by the statement that there were negotiations pending to settle these matters by treaty. This is true; but the terms of the treaty show that the injuries complained of were entirely lost sight of by the Administration in the desire to reverse the policy of the Government and to settle by treaty a question of national policy which the Constitution wisely conferred on the law-making power.

There is no one who has given this question consideration who doubts that if the Executive had been as anxious to secure the rights of American fishermen and other American citizens as he was to secure the triumph of the policy of free trade, those rights would have been secured; for the main motive of the Canadians in preventing the exercise of American rights was to compel the Americans to admit their products free of duty, a motive with which the President was and has been in entire harmony. I am therefore much in doubt whether it is wise to extend further power to the same Executive that has refused to exercise the power he already possesses, when the exercise of the powers sought might be attended with such grave consequences to the commercial interests of the people of the great Northwest.

The power to declare war and all other extensive powers with relation to commerce should be scrupulously held where the Constitution intended, in the hands of Congress, except in cases where it confers these powers temporarily on the Executive, and where its specific exercise is closely defined; and the objections to the grant are the greater where the Executive has, as in this case, entirely disregarded and ignored the authority conveyed in former grants, and where the failure of the President to act efficiently has had the clearly discovered purpose to compel the adoption of policies at variance with the will of the legislative power. Is there not danger that if such measures are encouraged our country will drift into an elective despotism instead of the government intended by the framers of the Constitution? [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMS. I have three minutes of my time remaining, and I yield sufficient time to the gentleman from Iowa to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KERR concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. HITT. I will now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST].

Mr. POST. I listened with special pleasure to the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] during his remarks as to the wisdom of the utterances of the President of the United States. The gentleman referred especially to the letter of acceptance of Mr. Cleveland. I presume he referred to the letter of acceptance of 1884. If that be true he did the President scant justice, for he said it met with the approval not merely of his own partisans but with that of the opposite party. I say he did the President scant justice, for the papers of the opposite party keep a portion of that letter as standing matter in their columns, and when he was speaking of it I had before me a copy of the New York Tribune of to-day containing it. It reads:

> When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and, more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of office-holders with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for re-election a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate, and intelligent action which must characterize government by the people.—President Cleveland's letter of acceptance, August 18, 1884.

The wisdom of these words in the light of recent events should be recognized by both parties. The complaint is not as to the wisdom of what the President says, but as to the wisdom of what he does. I should be loath to say of him as has been said of some one, that "he never said a foolish thing and never did a wise one." I do not think this eulogy of the gentleman from Mississippi had any special connection with the subject under discussion, but in passing I merely notice it. We are discussing the retaliation bill and what the President has done, or rather failed to do.

Mr. Speaker, when this nation resolves upon war Congress should promptly pass every measure which the executive government finds necessary for its successful prosecution. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] said in opening this debate:

There will be no division on sectional lines, but men of the South and men of the North will stand shoulder to shoulder in solid phalanx to defend American rights and American honor.

There has never been any doubt in the minds of those who fought for the Union, that those who fought against it would defend this country in case of a foreign war. When the blue and the gray united as comrades return victorious from that war, having earned the rewards due the soldiers of a republic, it may happen that some citizen who fought by substitute will have the "moral courage" and the power to defeat the representatives of a grateful people in fulfilling the nation's obligations.

When the embassador of France was insulted at Vienna, the French Government resolved upon retaliation and called in General Napoleon Bonaparte for his advice. He said, "If you want war with Austria I can furnish a better excuse for it."

Do we want war with England? Shall we prepare for it by encumbering our statute-books with a series of cumulative hostile laws to be utterly disregarded by our executive government?

The President in his message of August 23, 1888, recites that—

Our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises in waters adjacent to Canada have been subjected to numerous vexatious interferences and annoyances; their vessels have been seized upon pretexts which appeared to be entirely inadmissible, and they have been otherwise treated by the Canadian authorities and officials in a manner inexcusably harsh and oppressive.

Why was this message addressed to Congress? Why not England? Congress can not stop the wrong complained of; England can. Are the ungenerous and unneighborly acts on the part of Canada, so pathetically described in the message, only to be met by like ungenerous and unneighborly acts on our part? Is this the way a great government conducts its foreign affairs? Is it a dignified course?

What does the President want? When this question was last before this House in the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and discussed, as is customary, by the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I find a Democratic member of that committee, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Worthington, saying:

What are the wrongs of which we complain? The Canadian authorities have hindered and annoyed our inshore fishermen in the enjoyment of the privileges of shelter, repair, wood, and water guarantied to them by the treaty of 1818. They have also insisted that the deep-sea fishermen were subject to the same limitations as those applying to the inshore fishermen. That is all the difficulty between us and Canada. There is nothing else in dispute. Our intercourse in every other respect is just as free and harmonious as ever.

The President in his recent message contradicts this statement and shows that the member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs who used this language on March 2, 1887, knew little about the matter; that there were other questions and grievances, notably with reference to the use of the canals.

We find also that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] on the same day used the following language:

Does the House forget that one year ago we said to the President just what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] wants us to say to-day: "We trust you; on you is the responsibility; take all that you ask?" Does the House forget that then and there we passed the Dingley shipping bill without any trouble or delay, and said to the President: "Take what we are told you want; take it and fight the Canadian Government with fire as you wish; fight them with the same fire with which they fight us; here is your authority; close every port in the United States against Canadian vessels; deprive all of them in American ports of every right which American vessels are deprived of in the ports of the Dominion?" The President of the United States has had these powers for a year and has never yet used them.

To-day we are again discussing the question of granting more powers to fight Canada. With both hands full of weapons the President asks for more. Will not the people begin to think that it is not weapons which are needed but some one with skill and courage to use them?

Gentlemen on this floor make light of the idea of war in this connection and the country ridicules it, but should the spirit of retaliation be established along the whole length of our northern frontier, could that be called peace?

Why has not the President demanded of Canada the international rights and privileges to which this country is entitled? Why does he not do it now? The English press suggests "that serious international questions ought to be suspended for half a year before a general election." It more than intimates that the sudden change of position on the part of the President concerns only his re-election. A demand directed toward Canada rather than to Congress would remove the suspicion so widely believed.

The President of the United States already has and should always have authority to protect American ships upon the high seas, American citizens wherever they may be, and American rights by whatever power assailed.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] whatever time remains.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the order that was made a short time ago so as to continue the consideration of the pending bill to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal. The gentleman who objected before now withdraws his objection.

Mr. GEAR. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MCCREARY. The time fixed for the vote is 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, and it is necessary to make this modification in order to give time for all the gentlemen who are set down to make speeches.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the order is that the consideration of this bill shall be resumed immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] is that the order heretofore made be modified so that the House will resume the consideration of this bill to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the House several messages from the President.

Mr. MCCREARY. How long a time will it take to read the messages?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Perhaps ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. MCCREARY. I would suggest, as time is very precious, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] go on now until 5 o'clock, and then——

Mr. BAYNE. I prefer not to begin until morning. I ask unanimous consent that the messages be read now, and that the session of to-day be extended until the reading of them is completed.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I made the inquiry as to how much time it would take to read the messages in order that I might make a request for unanimous consent that this day's session should be extended until their reading could be completed.

Mr. BAYNE. That is my request.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

An act (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

JOHN DEAN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9372, entitled "An act granting a pension to John Dean."

The beneficiary named in this bill was mustered into the service of the United States February 25, 1863. He never went to the front, but while in camp at Staten Island, on the 21st day of April, 1863, was granted a pass for forty-eight hours, and on account of sickness did not again rejoin his company or regiment. The charge of desertion made against him has been removed. The Surgeon-General's report shows that he was treated at quarters on Staten Island in April, 1863, for syphilis, rheumatism, and debility.

He was admitted to Charity Hospital, Blackwell's Island, New York Harbor, August 5, 1863. He was admitted to the Ladies' General Hospital in New York December 1, 1863, and was discharged from the service for disability April 7, 1864.

The discharge was granted, as stated by the surgeon of volunteers in charge of the hospital, "because of sloughing of both corneas from inflammation contracted while absent without leave, having received a forty-eight-hour pass from his regiment April 15, 1863, then stationed on Staten Island. He lost his sight in August, 1863, while absent without leave. Unfit for Invalid Corps. Admitted to this hospital December 1, 1863. Not a case for pension."

A claim for pension was filed by the beneficiary at the Pension Bureau in March, 1877, alleging that on or about April 1, 1863, he suffered from chronic rheumatism and sore eyes occasioned by exposure and illness contracted in camp.

It will be observed that no affection of the eyes is mentioned in the record of his treatment in quarters.

The claimant was examined by the New York City board of surgeons in June, 1878, and no rheumatism was found to exist. He is now blind; and while his case is certainly a pitiable one, I am forced to the belief that the conclusions reached in 1879 upon his application, that his disease was contracted while absent without leave, and that his disability was due to syphilis, were correct.

C. T. MAPHET.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 217, entitled "An act granting a pension to C. T. Maphet."

This beneficiary enlisted August 1, 1863, and was discharged January 27, 1865, for disability.

The commander of the post certifies:

"This soldier says that he was first affected with the present disease, conjunctivitis, in the spring of 1862, since which time his eyes have never been well, and for a great portion of the time since enlistment he has been unfit for duty."

The certificate of the surgeon is as follows:

"Incapacitated by reason of long-standing conjunctivitis of both eyes, attended with partial opacity of the cornea. Disability existed prior to enlistment, consequently soldier is ineligible to the Veteran Reserve Corps."

The beneficiary filed no application for pension until April, 1883.

Notwithstanding some evidence of soundness prior to enlistment, it seems to be quite well established that the trouble with his eyes was not the result of his military service, but existed before enlistment.

CHARLES WALSTER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5503, entitled "An act granting a pension to Charles Walster."

This case has been very exhaustively examined by the Pension Bureau upon the application for a pension filed there by the beneficiary named in this bill. Upon a review of the evidence taken, it appears to be well established that any disability of the beneficiary heretofore existing was not attributable to his military service.

In addition to this a board of pension surgeons, as late as July, 1886, determined after a thorough medical investigation that no pensionable disability existed.

It thus appears that even if this bill were approved, there could be no rating, and the legislation would be of no advantage to the beneficiary named.

CATHERINE BUSSEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 333, entitled "An act granting a pension to Catherine Bussey."

It does not appear that the husband of this beneficiary ever applied for a pension. He was discharged from the volunteer Army on the 9th day of December, 1864, after a service of more than three years.

He was found dead on a railroad track on the 11th day of June, 1870, apparently having been struck by a passing train.

It is claimed that the deceased suffered a sunstroke while in the Army, which so affected his mind that he wandered upon the railroad track, and was killed in a fit of temporary insanity.

Though it would be gratifying to aid his widow, I do not think these facts are proven or can be assumed.

MRS. JANE POTTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5525, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts."

The husband of this beneficiary enlisted in 1861, and was mustered out of the service in April, 1865.

He was taken prisoner by the enemy and endured for a long time the hardship of prison life.

He never applied for a pension, though undoubtedly his health suffered to some extent as the result of his imprisonment.

The beneficiary married the soldier in 1871.

He conducted his business affairs, managed his farm and accumulated property up to the year 1880, when by a decree of court he was adjudged insane, caused by sickness as far as was known, and that his disease was hereditary.

It also appears that his mother and sister had periods of insanity.

He committed suicide in 1882 by drowning.

The beneficiary, his widow, filed a claim for pension in 1885, claiming that the insanity which caused him to commit suicide resulted from the hardships of prison life.

Upon this application the facts of the case have been thoroughly examined. Two witnesses indicate that domestic trouble was the cause of the soldier's suicide. Another says that his wife (the beneficiary) was a pretty rough woman—a hard talker—and that the soldier often consulted him about the matter, and said it was hard to live with her. This witness adds that he does not believe that the soldier would have committed suicide if she had not abused him till he could not longer endure it.

The special examiner, in summing up the proof, says in his report:

"The general opinion in the community is to the effect that his wife drove him to commit suicide rather than to live with or to obtain a divorce from her. Her reputation is that of a virago."

This kind of evidence, while not perhaps determining the case, reconciles me to the conclusion which seems inevitable from other facts developed, that the military service and prison experience of the deceased were in no manner connected with his death.

MRS. CATHERINE REED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 7717, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine Reed."

The husband of this beneficiary served in the Army from July 25, 1862, to October 16, 1862, when he was discharged for disease of the lungs. He was pensioned for hernia and disease of the lungs.

On the 23d day of November, 1880, while working in a saw-mill, a piece of board was thrown from a buzz saw and struck him in the groin, causing a wound from which he died two days afterwards.

It is impossible to connect this injury and the resulting death with the disability for which he was pensioned.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 7, 1888.

JACOB NEWHARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4855, entitled "An act granting a pension to Jacob Newhard."

The records show that this beneficiary was mustered into the service August 20, 1862, as a lieutenant; that on the return for November, 1862, he is reported as "absent without leave—left hospital at Louisville." He was treated for hemorrhoids in the hospital at Nashville from December 12 to December 23, 1862, when, having served a few days more than four months, he tendered his resignation upon the ground of disability, and procured the following surgeon's certificate, upon which his resignation was based:

"Lieut. Jacob Newhard having applied for a certificate upon which to ground a resignation, I do hereby certify that I have carefully examined this officer and find him suffering from hemorrhoids, * * * and in consequence thereof is in my opinion unfit for duty. I further declare my belief that he will not be fit for the duties of a soldier in any future time, having already been afflicted twelve years, as he asserts."

On the 14th day of February, 1880, nearly eighteen years after his resignation, the beneficiary filed his claim for pension based upon hemorrhoids, the result of diarrhea and fever.

He denied upon this application that he was unsound prior to enlistment, and filed evidence to support his denial. One of the witnesses, a surgeon, who testified to incurrence of disability in the service, on a special examination stated that he so testified, having satisfied himself of the fact by personal interviews with the beneficiary.

I do not think in the circumstances surrounding this case that the beneficiary should at this late day be permitted to impeach and set aside the medical certificate procured by himself and containing his own statements, upon which he secured exemption from further military service.

And then, under the standing order of the House, at 5 o'clock, the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 7, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ARABELLA DAVIS.

Mr. ROMEIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8553), which is already in the House, having been reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole. It is the bill granting a pension to Arabella Davis.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Arabella Davis, widow of Lieut. David Davis, late quartermaster of the Forty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, now deceased, subject to the limitations of the general pension laws.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the widow of David Davis, who served as first lieutenant of the Forty-fifth Ohio Volunteers from July 2, 1862, to June 17, 1863, when mustered out upon tender of his resignation, he being no longer able to endure the fatigues attending heavy marches. The claim of the widow has been rejected on the ground that the officer's fatal disease of kidneys was not due to erysipelas as alleged. He died June 1, 1886.

It is conclusively shown that Davis contracted erysipelas of leg while in the service, which disqualified him for further duty, and from which he was a constant sufferer until death. The physicians who treated him for some years after discharge are dead. Dr. Rowsey, who treated the officer in his last illness, testifies before the special examiner that he found him suffering with a complication of diseases—rheumatism, kidney disease, and erysipelas. The rheumatism involved all the joints in the body. The erysipelas was located in the legs. Dropsy set in of a general character. Dropsy was the result of his general broken-down condition, more specifically the disease of kidneys. Erysipelas utterly incapacitated him from movement. The immediate cause of his death was dropsy, the remote cause rheumatism.

There is other reliable evidence that Davis suffered more or less from rheumatism ever after discharge.

The special examiner, in submitting his report, makes the following statement:

"She (the widow) is a lady of excellent reputation in every respect, but, as I am informed, very poor; and I learned that she and her daughters have furnished the principal means of support both for themselves and the husband and father from the time he left the Army until he died, he being so disabled and incapacitated for labor that he earned but very little for the support of his family. The witnesses are all people of prominence in the community, and all testified unbiasedly. I have exhausted every source of information as to the soldier's physical condition since his discharge and return home from the Army, and I am firm in the belief that the claim is meritorious. That he was severely afflicted with erysipelas in one or both legs while in the service, which disability compelled him to resign, is to me satisfactorily proven, and that he was greatly disabled from the diseased condition of his leg from and at the time of his discharge until mortification set in, ending in death, seems to me well established."

Notwithstanding the favorable report of the special examiner, the claim was rejected as heretofore stated.

Recently the case was submitted to the medical advisory board of the Pension Office for further examination and report, which is as follows:

"A review of the evidence, as contained in the special examiner's report and as briefed in this case, confirms the opinion that upon the present legal approval the widow's claim must be rejected. That erysipelas or any disease resulting therefrom caused death can not be admitted. We are not fully satisfied that erysipelas existed as a factor in the last illness or that the condition testified to have existed in the legs was really erysipelatous. Dropsical accumulation dependent upon an organic disease distended the tissues and finally produced disintegration and absorption of tissue; hence the condition of the legs. According to the evidence of the attending physician, Bright's disease of the kidneys was the immediate organic cause of the dropsy, and rheumatism the remote. If the legal board can change the approval to rheumatism and results, or to disease of kidneys, we can act favorably on the claim, but if not, then rejection must be adhered to."

This change of approval has not been made, and therefore the rejection stands.

With the rheumatic history in the case, which the medical board fully recognized, it is the opinion of your committee that this difference of opinion between the two subordinate boards of the Pension Bureau should no longer deprive the widow of a pension. From the petition of a number of the most prominent citizens of Toledo, Ohio, now before us, it appears that she is an invalid, and has no means of support or income.

This bill is therefore returned, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROMEIS] that this bill be now considered?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this bill was considered in Committee of the Whole at a former session and was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The question, therefore, is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROMEIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YODER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Before that motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request. I have a very peculiar case, and I desire to ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be now put upon its passage.

Mr. PAYSON. It will soon be reached.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If gentlemen would listen I am sure they would not object. It is a case of a totally blind man, seventy-two years of age——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Regular order is demanded. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YODER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business under the special order.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent we proceed in the same way that we did last Friday evening, that the call of the roll be resumed at the point where we left off at the close of the last Friday evening's session, and that each member present as his name is reached have the privilege of calling up a bill for consideration.

Mr. ATKINSON. I move to amend so as to have the call commence at the beginning of the roll.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. FANNIE A. BOYD.

Mr. BUTLER. I call up the bill (H. R. 9963) to increase the pension of Mrs. Fannie A. Boyd, widow of Captain O. B. Boyd.

The bill was read.

Mr. CHEADLE. Time will be saved by passing this bill over.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the objection to it?

Mr. CHEADLE. The objection is that it proposes to grant a pension beyond the amount authorized by law.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not suppose the gentleman will have any objection to it when he understands the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that this bill has already been considered in the Committee of the Whole and reported to the House, and is one of the bills on the Calendar as unfinished business.

Mr. PAYSON. Then it is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. I called up this bill for the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLISS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can call up another bill.

MRS. SOPHIA VOGELSANG.

Mr. BUTLER. I call up the bill (H. R. 10661) granting a pension to Mrs. Sophia Vogelsang.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Sophia Vogelsang, widow of Dietrick Vogelsang, late a private in Company A, First Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Dietrick Vogelsang was a private in Company A, First Regiment Minnesota Volunteers. He was a pensioner up to his death because of the loss of his left leg, amputated by reason of wounds received in battle. Sophia, his widow, married him at Detroit, Mich., in 1849, and is now well advanced in years, being fifty-six years old; is in reduced circumstances and unable to labor. She made an application to the Pension Bureau in 1885, just after his death, for a pension, which was rejected on the ground that his death proceeded from the use of morphine. There is no doubt that he used this drug. This stump never healed, but was in a state of constant irritation, causing him terrible pain, to assuage which he resorted to morphia.

Dr. Kiefer, one of the best surgeons in Detroit, testifies that he treated him in October, 1862, after he was wounded, when "he was suffering with gangrene of the left amputated thigh, the flesh having been destroyed to a great extent by the gangrene," and that he had to make another amputation (January, 1863) high up. The stump healed, but broke out again, and the patient was obliged to take morphia to alleviate his severe and constant pain. In Dr. Kiefer's opinion he died from the combined effects of the morphia and the wound.

In the opinion of the committee it is a very nice distinction to say that he is not entitled to a pension because he died, not directly from the effect of the wound, but from the effect of medicine he was obliged to take in order to live under the suffering caused by the wound.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN F. BAIR.

Mr. CAINE. I call up the bill (H. R. 9862) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Bair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin F. Bair, late corporal Company I, Seventy-third Indiana Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

Benjamin F. Bair served in Company I, Seventy-third Regiment, Indiana Volunteers, from July 29, 1862, to March 21, 1863, when discharged by reason of defective vision. He alleges that at Lexington, Ky., in October, 1862, he received a saber cut in left hand; also that he was wounded in right groin and knee by the bursting of a shell at Gallatin, Tenn., in January, 1863, and that he contracted disease of right eye, resulting in total blindness of the same. The claim for wound of groin and knee was subsequently withdrawn, while the claim for wound of left hand and loss of sight of right eye was rejected by the Pension Bureau because there is no record of said disabilities and the parol evidence is not deemed sufficient to establish the same.

Capt. E. M. Williamson, of aforesaid company, testifies that claimant was wounded in left hand on October 20, 1862, while attempting to capture a Confederate captain and two privates. He was in company with two of his comrades, and was cut in the hand with a saber by said captain. The wound was dressed by the surgeon of the regiment. Also contracted sore eyes at Silver Spring, Tenn., by reason of which he was sent to the Gallatin (Tenn.) Hospital.

Reputation of affiant is shown to be good.

The regimental hospital records of the Seventy-third Indiana Volunteers and hospital records of Gallatin, Tenn., are not on file in the Surgeon-General's Office.

There is considerable evidence on file showing that claimant was sound at enlistment, and that on his return home to Plymouth, Ind., he suffered from a wound of hand and an affection of the right eye. He remained at home but a short time, when he left for the West, and has since so often changed his residence that it is impossible for him to obtain much evidence of his condition since the close of the war.

Medical examination finds total blindness of right eye from atrophy of optic nerve, also wound of left hand with loss of little finger through contraction.

While the claim is not supported with the usual accumulating evidence, for reasons heretofore stated, in the absence of any adverse evidence the testimony of the captain, who is shown to be a reputable witness, should be accepted as sufficient to establish the wound of left hand and loss of sight of right eye as of service and chargeable thereto.

Your committee therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES JUNOT.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10687) granting a pension to Charles Junot.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Junot, of Louisville, Ky., who served in the Florida war under the name of Tom Jones.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The claimant, under the name of Thomas Jones, was a private in Capt. Alexander Jernigan's company of Florida Mounted Militia from March 2, 1840, to November 14, 1840; and the regiment did duty in the Florida Indian war. A land warrant was allowed this claimant for the services rendered, his identity being established in that claim.

He is now sixty-six years of age, and in needy circumstances, being also physically disabled.

His case would fall within the provisions of the general service-pension bill for the survivors of the Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, favorably reported by this committee at the present session of Congress.

Your committee recommend the allowance to the claimant of a service pension, and therefore report the bill back recommending its passage; amended, however, by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and inserting at the end of the bill the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month."

The amendments stated in the last paragraph of the report were read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. SUSAN V. WILCOX.

Mr. CHEADLE. I call up the bill (H. R. 7485) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan V. Wilcox, mother of Martin V. Wilcox.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Susan V. Wilcox, mother of Martin V. Wilcox, deceased, late private Company A, One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate prescribed by existing provisions of law.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Susan V. Wilcox is the dependent mother of Martin V. Wilcox, who enlisted August 12, 1862, and died in Louisiana, at quarantine, of fever, January 18, 1863.

Mother filed declaration for pension April 19, 1886, alleging dependence on soldier at the time of his death. Claim was rejected on the ground that claimant admits non-dependence on the soldier during the term of his Army service.

An examination of the papers on file discloses that this claimant at the time of the soldier's death was married and living on a small farm of 21 acres near Canaan, N. Y.; that the proceeds from this farm were barely sufficient to support the family, and that the so dier prior to his enlistment contributed by his daily labor to the support of the family, and continued to do so during the term of his service and up to the time of his death.

There are numerous affidavits showing that from the time of soldier's death claimant's husband was incapacitated by reason of sickness from earning a subsistence for his family; that their little property was mortgaged, and at the time of the husband's death was insufficient to furnish her a support; that since that time she has supported herself by keeping boarders, and that now, at the age of seventy, she is broken in health, unable to work, and is supported in part by relatives.

Your committee believe that the evidence establishes that this claimant was partly dependent upon the soldier during his enlistment. Her advanced age and present condition should entitle her to a pension, and we therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNA M. NOYES.

Mr. COGSWELL. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2471) granting a pension to Anna M. Noyes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna M. Noyes, widow of Benjamin M. Noyes, late Captain of Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows;

Anna M. Noyes is the widow of Benjamin F. Noyes, who served as captain of Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, from September 24, 1862, to September 3, 1363. He was a pensioner on account of dyspepsia and constipation, resulting from malarial poisoning, and died November 29, 1884, of catarrhal pneumonia. The widow's claim has been rejected on the ground that, in the opinion of the medical referee of the Pension Bureau, the fatal disease is not chargeable to the soldier's military service.

The records of the War Department establish the fact that Captain Noyes was sick from May 31 to August 26, 1863, was treated during that period for typhoid malarial fever, and was at date of discharge suffering from neuralgia, feverish habits, and general debility.

Dr. F. V. Cooke, the attending physician, testifies that he treated the officer during the last two years of his life. He was a constant sufferer from dyspepsia, constipation, and kidney trouble, caused in affiant's opinion, by malarial poisoning incurred in the service. Treated him in 1883 for malarial fever and several times for catarrhal dyspepsia. His constitution was so undermined from his long suffering that it was very difficult to pull him through. He contracted a severe cold, with chills and fever, about November 23, 1884, and continued in a dangerous condition for several days. Affiant diagnosed the case as one of pneumonitis, complicated by the catarrhal condition of the stomach and persistent constipation. Affiant is certain that had the acute disease not been complicated with the diseases of army origin the patient would have recovered.

Dr. William R. Chipman testifies that he attended the soldier in his last illness, in consultation with Dr. Cook, and that in his opinion he would have recovered if the disease, pneumonitis, had not been complicated with the army troubles.

While the direct cause of Captain Noyes's death was not the result of army service, there can be no doubt that the recognized diseases of that service were important factors in the same, and for this reason your committee are of opinion that the widow, who is badly disabled in right hand and in very feeble health, should at least have the benefit of the doubt, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the letter "M." after the word "Benjamin," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the letter "F."

The amendment stated at the close of the report was read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. M'QUEEN.

Mr. CONGER. I call up the bill (H. R. 11243) granting a pension to Mary E. McQueen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary E. McQueen, an imbecile daughter of Anthony McQueen, late a private of Company D, Thirty-first Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, and pay to her duly appointed guardian a pension of $18 per month on and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The proposed beneficiary is the daughter of Anthony McQueen, jr., who served as private in Company D, Thirty-first Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, from August 14, 1862, to June 20, 1865, and died April 14, 1869, from chronic diarrhea contracted in service. His widow, Ellen McQueen, was a pensioner, and is now dead, as appears from the certificate of the United States pension agent at Des Moines, Iowa. The soldier left surviving him six children under sixteen years of age, all of whom are now over pensionable age, and consequently no one is now drawing any pension on account of his death.

Mary E. McQueen is about thirty years of age and is an imbecile, utterly incapable of self-support, as shown by medical and lay testimony before your committee. She has no means of support, being dependent upon relatives who have a hard struggle to provide for themselves.

The liberal policy of Congress towards the dependent relatives of deceased soldiers, not provided for under the general pension laws, suggests the propriety of relief in this case.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PERRY R. NYE.

Mr. CROUSE. I call up the bill (H. R. 6409) for the relief of Perry R. Nye.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Perry R. Nye, late of Company E, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

Perry R. Nye served as a private in Company E, Tenth Regiment Ohio Cavalry. He made application for pension March 31, 1880, and the claim was rejected. He alleges as a disability hernia, which he says he incurred in the service and in line of duty. Claimant makes oath that he was one of a detail for foraging, and that the party while so foraging was attacked and that all but one besides himself were killed or taken prisoners. He says that while he was escaping his horse fell and threw him and rolled on him, thus producing rupture. There was but one eye-witness and that man is dead, therefore claimant can not furnish testimony of two witnesses who saw him incur the disability. Comrades and officers testify that he was, immediately after the time of receiving the alleged injury, unfit for duty and was excused from duty.

There is ample testimony in the case to show that claimant was a sound man when he entered the service, and that at the time of his return he was suffering from rupture, and has since his return continuously suffered from rupture. One comrade makes oath that said claimant exhibited the hurt to him at the time it is alleged to have been received, and that the hurt was puffed out as large as a hen's egg; that he put his hand on the injured part and it felt soft as though the bowels had passed out in a cavity. Other affidavits show that immediately on the return of the claimant from the service he was found to have a rupture and was fitted with a truss, and that since that time he has been obliged to wear a truss.

Examining surgeons say that he could not do hard work without wearing a truss.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA A. EATON.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2472) granting a pension to Lydia A. Eaton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lydia A. Eaton, widow of William G. Eaton, late of Company A, Thirty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the widow of William G. Eaton, who served as a private in Company A, Thirty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, from August 2, 1862, to July 12, 1865. He was a pensioner for chronic rheumatism, and died August 4, 1884. The widow's claim has been rejected on the ground that the fatal disease, cystitis, in the opinion of the medical referee of the Pension Bureau, was not a sequel to the chronic rheumatism. This action has been affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Medical examination in 1875 showed chronic rheumatism in knees, hips, ankles, and shoulders, and numbness on outward side of right thigh. Medical examination in 1878 finds chronic rheumatism mostly in knee and ankles, sometimes in hips, shoulders, and wrists. Invalid states was disabled three weeks in May by inflammatory rheumatism. When he contracts cold it is worse.

Soldier was under medical treatment from date of discharge until death; but the death of the attending physician prior to 1884 leaves the case without medical evidence, except the examinations heretofore referred to during that period.

Dr. Perly E. Goodhue, of Haverhill, Mass., commenced the treatment of soldier in March, 1884, who was then suffering from chronic rheumatism and cystitis. Treatment continued until death, which was caused by acute cystitis, a subacute or chronic form of which he had suffered for years, being, in affiant's opinion, due to a weakened condition of the entire system, rendered thus by chronic rheumatism. Had not his physical strength been so seriously impaired by the existing rheumatism he would neither have been affected by the cystitis nor would death have been caused by any inflammatory process of equal severity. Lay witnesses testify to the existence of kidney troubles from discharge to death.

Were it not for the death of the first physician after discharge the widow, undoubtedly, would not have been under the necessity of coming to Congress, but could have established her title to pension before the proper bureau.

Your committee, however, are of opinion that the connection between the death cause and the service has been sufficiently established without the missing medical evidence, so as to entitle the widow to the favorable consideration of Congress, and therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ESTER GAVEN.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call up the bill (H. R. 11005) granting a pension to Ester Gaven.

The bill was read, follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Ester Gavan, widow of Bernard Gaven, late a member of Company D, Seventy-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

Ester Gaven is the widow of Bernard Gaven, private of Company D, Seventy-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, now deceased. This widow applied for pension on account of husband's death having been the result of disease contracted by him while in the service and in line of duty. This case, by the papers on file in the Pension Office and by the records in the Surgeon-General's Office, has been clearly established, all except the proof of the immediate cause of his death. He having been sick a long time suffering from chronic diarrhea and disease of the stomach, the disability alleged for pension, and they being poor people, had, it appears, no regular family physician who could testify in case of his death.

Mrs. Gaven is quite old and feeble and broken down in health, and has become a charge on the community in which she lives. The record clearly shows that her husband was a brave and good soldier. There is testimony on file as to soundness prior to his enlistment; also as to contracting disease in the service and in line of duty, there is no doubt. In fact, if this missing link of the evidence of the attending physician or some other competent evidence could be procured as to the cause of his death the case would have been allowed. Your committee is clearly of the opinion, from the evidence on file, that it could be proved that the cause of death was the result of the disease contracted in the Army; and from a careful investigation your committee is of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH HECKLER.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I call up the bill (H. R. 11222) granting a pension to Elizabeth Heckler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Heckler, widow of the late Francis Heckler, of the Thirty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11222) granting a pension to Elizabeth Heckler, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The proposed beneficiary is the widow of Francis Heckler, who served in the United States Navy from March 3, 1841, to March 8, 1845, and as musician of the Thirty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers from May 17, 1861, to June 23, 1862, when he was discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability. The soldier applied for pension August 5, 1879, on account of asthma contracted in the spring of 1862 at Hunter's Chapel, Va. He died without completing his claim September 30, 1880. The claim was, however, completed by the widow after a very thorough special examination. Her claim has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the fatal disease, cystitis, is not accepted as a result of the asthma.

The diagnosis of the fatal disease was made by a physician who had no personal acquaintance with the soldier until within a week of his death, and who admits in his deposition before the special examiner that he knew of no other difficulty in the case at time of his treatment of Heckler. Yet the proof in support of the invalid claim for asthma is so overwhelmingly strong as to its severeness from date of discharge to death that the Commissioner of Pensions upon a personal review of the case directed, even in the absence of a medical examination (the claim not having been reached for action thereon during the soldier's life-time), a reissue of the original certificate at one-half of total to a total pension from date of discharge.

The special examiner in his report says:

"There is no evidence whatever that cystitis, etc., existed up to a few weeks before his death, and there is overwhelming evidence that he suffered greatly and continuously from discharge to death with asthma. From personal experience I know that cystitis, etc., is a painful but lingering disease, and one that does not result fatally in a few weeks or months."

Again he says:

"The claim is a singularly clear one, and the witnesses exceptionally reliable, and it is very plainly shown that the soldier was sound and healthy before enlistment, and earning a good living by his profession as a musician, and that after his discharge he never earned, nor was able to earn, a dollar at it owing to asthma."

Admitting that cystitis did exist during the last week or two prior to death, and that it became necessary to relieve the suffering therefrom by medical treatment, there yet remains the undisputed fact that asthma was, and had been for years, the principal disabling cause, and that it alone was of such a serious character as to cause death at any moment.

The claim of the widow is highly meritorious, and therefore the bill is returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JENNY BUELL.

Mr. GEAR. I call up the bill (H. R. 10159) granting a pension to Jenny Buell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Jenny Buell, widow of Henry C. Buell, late a private in Company B, Fourteenth Regiment New York State Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10159) granting a pension to Jenny Buell, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

Claimant is the widow of Henry C. Buell, who served as private of Company B, Fourteenth New York Volunteers, from May 17, 1861, to May 24, 1863. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Winchester May 25, 1862, and kept in Southern prisons until September 13, 1862. From exposure during imprisonment he contracted scurvy and chronic diarrhea, and finally died of pneumonia April 22, 1886. The claim for chronic diarrhea was established; that for scurvy is not established.

The claim of the widow has been rejected on the ground that the death cause, pneumonia, is not accepted as a result of the service.

It being conceded that chronic diarrhea was contracted in the service, there is no necessity to refer to the evidence on that point. It is claimed, and the evidence corroborates the allegation, that the soldier became much emaciated from the effect of chronic diarrhea of more than twenty years' standing. A few months prior to his death it became necessary, in consequence of the disease with which he was suffering, for him to obey the calls of nature, and in so doing caught a cold, and had a spell of sickness, from which he had only partially recovered when he was under like circumstances again exposed to the inclemency of the weather and contracted pneumonia. His enfeebled condition made it less possible to successfully treat this acute disease, and death ensued. The attending physician expressly states that what seemed a severe cold, although not serious, developed into pneumonia because of the emaciation from chronic diarrhea.

The widow is dependent upon her own labor for her support and that of two children, with the exception of an income of $7.50 per month, the greater part of which, however, in fact belongs to relations, but is not claimed by them because of her poverty and dependence.

Your committee are of opinion that the evidence does show that the death cause of the soldier is at least indirectly connected with his military service, and therefore report favorably on accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISA V. DE KILPATRICK.

Mr. GEST. I call up the bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers, and to pay her a pension from the passage of this act, for and during her natural life, at the rate of $100 per month, in lieu of the pensions he may be receiving under any prior law.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The report of the Senate committee is as follows:

"It appears from the papers on file that General Judson Kilpatrick, the husband of the applicant, was mustered into the service May 9, 1861, and appointed brigadier-general June 13, 1863, and discharged January 1, 1866.

"From the papers submitted there appears to be a conflict in the testimony between the examining surgeon and the physicians who attended the general during his last illness. General Kilpatrick died December 2, 1884, of Bright's disease of the kidneys, at Santiago, Chili.

"There is abundance of medical testimony showing that his death was caused by Bright's disease, which may have been induced by exposure in the service of his country.

"Your committee, however, feel that the distinguished and valuable service rendered by General Kilpatrick during the war of the rebellion entitles his widow to a just recognition from the Government he so ably and faithfully served. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment:

"Strike out the words 'two thousand dollars per annum' in the ninth line and insert the words 'one hundred dollars per month.'"

Recognizing the eminent services of General Kilpatrick your committee likewise report favorably on the bill, and ask that it pass, amended, however, by striking out the words "one hundred" in line 7 and inserting therein instead the words "seventy-five."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the further amendment to strike out the words "for and during her natural life."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RICHARD HUDSON.

Mr. GUENTHER. I call up the bill (S. 2576) granting a pension to Richard Hudson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Richard Hudson, late of Company B, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2576) granting a pension to Richard Hudson, submits the following report:

The beneficiary under this bill has heretofore filed his claim for a pension in the Pension Office, where the same was rejected. The ground on which the same was rejected was that the beneficiary was unsound at the time of his enlistment.

The committee think it entirely clear from the evidence as set forth in the Senate report, hereto annexed and made a part hereof, that the ruling of the Pension Office failed to do justice; and believing that the case is a meritorious one, they recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 987, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to Richard Hudson, have examined the same and report:

The claimant was a member of Company B, Third Wisconsin Cavalry; enlisted December 17, 1861; was discharged June 29, 1863; for disability. He claims pension for hernia incurred at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, Mo., on guard duty at night while crossing a ravine, sustaining a severe fall.

Several witnesses testify to his prior soundness, to their personal intimacy with him, and having seen him in a nude state, whereby they would have known it if he had hernia before enlistment.

Thomas T. Smith testifies that he was a member of the same company; that at Benton Barracks, St. Louis, Mo., about the month of April, 1852, said Hudson, while on guard duty, crossing a ravine, received a fall by which he was severely ruptured; that he went with him to Dr. Reynolds, the regimental surgeon, who, after partially stripping him, made an examination and declared that he had been severely ruptured and gave a certificate to that effect, and Hudson was then exempted from duty.

William Spikes, another comrade, testified that Hudson was placed on guard duty at Benton Barracks to prevent soldiers from scaling the fence and deserting; that in attempting to prevent the escape of a soldier or soldiers in the nighttime he fell, and the fall produced rupture. He was taken off duty and remained off until discharged.

Dr. Reynolds, surgeon of the regiment, made two statements, which he says he can not reconcile. One was that he was ruptured in the service, and the other that his rupture existed before enlistment. He thinks he must have been mistaken as to one or the other; which, he can not determine. He found several hernias after he got in the field; soldiers had eluded examination by him previous to muster; that officers connived at keeping recruits from being examined when found "I was rejecting men for hernia." He was mistaken in one or the other of his statements as to this man.

In his testimony made to a special examiner his bias is strongly against the claimant. The doctor's reputation is good, but as to this matter his statements are so mixed as to be valueless for or against the claim.

The certificate of discharge is signed by A. L. David, captain, and Dr. Reynolds, surgeon. The first says he was unaware of claimant's disability at the time of his enlistment, but has since ascertained that he had a breach, and he has good reason to believe that it was of several years' standing. Dr. Reynolds, in the same certificate, says:

"He has inguinal hernia of several years' duration; he was mustered into the service without having been examined."

It is not probable that soldiers "eluded" examination. It is admitting a very lax and reprehensible military system to assume that recruits could elude examination, or officers connive at keeping recruits from being examined. If the Government's resources were so limited that such expedients as are here admitted were resorted to for the purpose of replenishing our forces, it is a little late in the day to avoid the payment of a pension by using the statements of recruiting officers who certify to such disgraceful expedients.

There have been three special examinations in this case; one by an examiner named Van Buren, who magnifies whatever is to the disadvantage of the claimant, and whose report as to its chirography is almost unintelligible.

Russell Barnes, another special examiner, concludes his report, which is on the average quite favorable, with the comment that "the claim has merit."

There is in the file a review of the case by "Winans, examiner," approved by "S. R. Hersay, assistant chief, Western division," which, in the opinion of the committee, shows conclusively that the claim should have been admitted by the Pension Office. It is adopted as a part of this report, and is as follows:

"Believing injustice has been done claimant in rejecting his claim above named, it is again submitted for admission. The record evidence on which said claim has been rejected is a copy of certificate of disability for discharge, signed by Capt. A. L. David and Surgeon B. O. Reynolds. In it the captain in his statement is vague and indefinite; admits he has rupture, and he has good reason to believe it is of several years' standing, but does not furnish any of those 'good reasons' for such belief. Surgeon Reynolds in said certificate says inguinal hernia of several years' standing. In an affidavit filed December 12, 1882, he states claimant incurred rupture about April 15, 1862, and was discharged for same. In a letter filed March 19, 1884, he states: 'At this time I have no personal knowledge of claimant's condition when he enlisted. I can not reconcile the statement that he was ruptured about April 15, 1862, and the one in certificate of disability that it was of several years' standing. Must have been mistaken in one or the other statement.'

"Lieutenant Wagner, afterwards captain, states claimant was sound; also Comrades Thomas T. Smith and William Spink. After the first rejection of claim by Assistant Chief Green, of Western division, on certificate of disability for discharge, the evidence of Charles E. Lewis and James Johnson is furnished, all of whom state from personal knowledge that claimant was sound immediately prior to enlistment. Charles E. Lewis and James Johnson were specially examined, and Hon. PHILETUS SAWYER certifies all the witnesses are credible. Lieutenant Wagner testifies as to incurrence of injury, and states that the surgeon pronounced it rupture of groin. Comrade Thomas T. Smith states he went with claimant to Surgeon Reynolds, who examined claimant and declared he had incurred a severe rupture of groin. Corporal Miller makes a similar statement. Comrade Spink also testifies, from claimant's statement, as to incurrence of injury. Surgeon Reynolds testifies in affidavit filed December 12, 1882, that at Benton Barracks, Mo, about April 15, 1862, he incurred a rupture of right side and was discharged for same in June, 1862. Claimant, who Hon. PHILETUS SAWYER states is a good and honorable man, swears positively he was not ruptured before he enlisted, and that he did incur it at Benton Barracks, Mo., about April 15, 1862."

It is a matter of fact that this man was drafted after his discharge, and that he was rejected in consequence of the rupture for which he was discharged.

The committee does not attempt to reconcile the contradictory evidence of Surgeon Reynolds, nor the conflicting views of the Pension Office examiners. There is positive testimony from parties whom the maker of this report knows to be men of the very best standing, showing that this man was sound when he enlisted, that he incurred his disability in the line of duty, and that his claim should have been admitted long ago.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTIAN WINKEL.

Mr. HAUGEN. I call up the bill (S. 3186) granting a pension to Christian Winkel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christian Winkel, late a private in Company B, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3186) granting a pension to Christian Winkel, submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is adopted, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

SENATE REPORT.

Christian Winkel was a member of Company B, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry. He bases his claim upon the incurrence in the Army of diarrhea and flux and resulting disease of skin. The Pension Office statement is that his claim was rejected "upon the ground that claimant admits before a special examiner having been affected with diarrhea, piles, and constipation before enlistment, and that the disease of skin did not develop until after discharge."

This is somewhat a peculiar case. Christian Winkel, the claimant, a German, a stranger in our land, without the slightest knowledge of the English language, was drafted. The time he was in the service covered about ten months, and ended with the close of the war. He was a faithful soldier, always on duty except when he was sick.

"Henry Krumdick testifies that he was a comrade of Winkel, often occupied the same tent, and he knows that his skin disease was caused by hard service, exposure, and taking cold, and thinks it was from blood-poisoning. He visited him once at the hospital between Washington and Alexandria, and he complained much of this disease, but did not know what it was."

Yet the Pension Office says the disease did not develop until two or three months after discharge. This conclusion by the bureau, and the fact, as the Commissioner states, that Winkel admitted that he had chronic diarrhea and piles before he was drawn into the service, was the basis of the decision that his disabilities existed prior to his service, and therefore he is not entitled to a pension.

In the claim there is contradictory testimony, and one witness goes so far beyond the bounds of probability as to say that he has not been disabled and that he is not now.

It is also apparent that the Pension Office officials have conflicting views. One of the special examiners criticises another, and says:

"The report of Mr. Raymond I regard valueless, because to my knowledge he does not understand German, and employed as interpreter an ignorant hostler, acting at the time as his driver."

The special examinations, the evidence filed, and the record of the man's service, in the opinion of the committee, develop these facts:

He was drafted, was accepted, served his time faithfully, and was discharged. The fact that he was accepted should have conclusive weight with the committee that he was sound. The only showing to the contrary is the alleged admission made by him through an interpreter that before service he had piles and rheumatism, but they were cured. In an affidavit Winkel says he claims pension for skin disease incurred during the war, and he adds:

"That his claim for pension was misstated from the beginning; those who drew his papers misunderstood because he don't understand English."

And furthermore he says:

"That he is wronged by the special examiner, C. B. Rockwood. When C. B. Rockwood conducted my examination at the office of C. Hageman, esq., he ordered me to Appleton for a medical examination; but when I did come there I hunted two days in every hotel and by every doctor in the city in vain for Mr. Rockwood, and telegraphed twice to him, and received answer, not at home; and don't know, not yet, to-day where Mr. Rockwood and his medical examination is."

Gregor Anhalt testifies that he has known Winkel twenty years, and he is positive that his skin disease is the result of blood-poisoning while in the service.

"I drew my belief (he says) by seeing and examining and cupping him a short time after his discharge."

Special Examiner Rockwood in his report says:

"I am impressed with the evident truth of claimant's statement, and regard his particular description of the disease of skin equivalent to a surgical examination."

There is evidence to show that this disease is loathsome and causes severe suffering; also that he is disabled to some extent with piles, constipation, and rheumatism. The ground for rejection stated by the Pension Office is not approved by the committee. The mass of evidence is against the conclusion that he was disabled before the service, and the skin disease is clearly a result of his soldier life, but even if the Pension Office conclusion was correct, that the military authorities were guilty of the blunder of accepting for a soldier a man broken and diseased, he cheerfully accepted the situation, fought like a man in good health, and contributed his best efforts to save the country he had adopted. In his present condition he needs relief, and, in the opinion of the committee, it would not only be unjust, but a national disgrace to deny it. The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUT. GEORGE T. RUSSELL.

Mr. HERMANN. I call up the bill (H. R. 2788) granting a pension to Lieut. George T. Russell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George T. Russell, late a first lieutenant by brevet in the Seventeenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and later of the Eighty-seventh Company, Veteran Reserve Corps, from which he was discharged by resignation at Cairo, Ill., November 18, 1865.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2788) granting a pension to Lieut. George T. Russell, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

George T. Russell enlisted July 16, 1861, in Company C, Thirteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, was promoted to second lieutenant, Seventeenth Massachusetts Volunteers, February 19, 1862, and mustered out, upon tender of resignation because of disability, September 24, 1862. He again entered the service July 20, 1863, as second lieutenant of the Veteran Reserve Corps, and was finally mustered out November 16, 1865. His claim for pension on account of rheumatism and effects of malarial fever has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the evidence is not deemed sufficient to connect the former with the service, and medical examination failed to show the existence of any disability from the latter cause.

It appears from the records of the War Department that Lieutenant Russell suffered from remittent fever from July 12 to September 20, 1862, while stationed at New Berne, N. C., and at home on leave, having received a furlough for twenty days July 21, 1862. Immediately upon his arrival home in the fall of 1862 he came under treatment of Dr. Bradford, now deceased, for malarial poisoning and rheumatism, a common sequence of the former. As heretofore stated, Russell again entered the service in July, 1863. The Adjutant-General states, "the disability for which he was appointed in the invalid corps was occasioned by disease in service and wound in battle." Upon his final muster-out in 1865, Russell is shown to have suffered so severely from rheumatism as to compel him to give up agricultural pursuits, in which he had previously been engaged, and to engage in teaching school, which has been his principal occupation ever since.

There is ample testimony on file, both medical and lay, showing that Russell has been a great sufferer from rheumatism ever since discharge. Medical examination reveals muscular rheumatism and an anæmic condition.

From all the evidence in the case your committee are of opinion that claimant did contract malarial poisoning and rheumatism while in the military service of the United States, and that his present disabled condition is chargeable thereto.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STATIRA YOUNG.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I call up the bill (H. R. 5174) granting a pension to Statira Young.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Statira Young, widow of Joseph Young, Company D, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5174) granting a pension to Statira Young, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

Statira Young is the widow of Joseph Young, who enlisted August 15, 1862, in Company D, Twelfth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and was discharged on account of wounds received at Chancellorsville, Va., May 3, 1863. He was a pensioner at the rate of $18 per month for gunshot wound of right hip, scrotum, and penis, and died August 18, 1881, of disease of brain. The widow's claim has been rejected on the ground that the fatal disease was not due to the wound for which pensioned. This action was based upon the assumption of the attending physician that the bullet was lodged in the sacral region of the spine, whereas the fact is that it passed through the thigh and out through the testicle and penis.

The last medical examination of the soldier, May 4, 1881, shows as follows:

"Ball entered nates, passed back of femur, through the thigh, scrotum, and penis, destroying the right testicle. The right leg is much smaller than the left and nearly useless; both arms are affected, the right nearly useless. He is deaf in right ear and blind in right eye. Left leg is weak and failing. Applicant seems to be constantly growing worse; is now a broken-down man, almost demented."

Dr. W. F. Baldwin testifies that he was called in the case August 14, 1881; found soldier suffering from pain at base of brain and extending along the spinal cord; gastric catarrh evident; pupils affected; spasms of muscles of lower limbs. Diagnosed the case spinal inflammation and extension to brain, dependent on wound and exposure in the Army.

Drs. Powers and Sanborn also testify to cause of soldier's death, corroborative of the testimony of Baldwin.

Partial paralysis of right limb followed immediately upon the wound, as shown by the certificate of disability for discharge, and continued till death. It was recognized by the Pension Office as a sequela of the wound, and included in the rating.

It would seem that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the fatal disease should have been held as directly chargeable to the severe wound received in the service. Its serious effects upon the nervous system are conceded by the Pension Office. The attending physicians evidently erred in their diagnosis of the case, resting their judgment upon the assumption that the ball had not been extracted. The wound itself, without the presence of the ball, affords ample ground for favorable action in the case of the widow. She was married to the soldier in 1847, and for the last eighteen years of his life faithfully cared for him in his almost helpless condition. She is without means and now nearly eighty years of age.

Your committee return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH E. ROBERTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. The name of Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, has been called, and I wish to state that he is ill and has requested me to call up for him the bill (H. R. 2127) for the relief of George E. Roberts.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. KILGORE. I must object to this bill, but I do not object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I know nothing about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be passed over, not to lose its place on the Calendar, if there be no objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not object to that.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LIEUT. STARKEY R. POWELL.

Mr. KILGORE. I call up the bill (H. R. 10068) granting a pension to Lieut. Starkey R. Powell, of Black Hawk war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Starkey R. Powell, late lieutenant in Capt. William B. Smith's company of the Third Regiment of Illinois Mounted Volunteers in the Black Hawk war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10068) granting a pension to Starkey R. Powell, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant served as first lieutenant in Capt. William B. Smith's company, Third Regiment Illinois Mounted Volunteers, from April 21 to May 27, 1832, Black Hawk war.

A statement signed by about eighty of the prominent citizens of his county, including Hon. J. M. Riggs, ex-member of Congress, certifies that the claimant is eighty-one years of age, infirm and sickly, unable to perform any manual labor, and in need of relief.

His case falls within the provisions of the bill to pension the survivors of this and other Indian wars between 1832 and 1842, favorably reported by this committee.

Owing to his rank, age, and infirm condition, your committee report back the bill, recommending its passage at the rate of $30 per month. They therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in line 9, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL A. TATE.

Mr. LANDES. I call up the bill (S. 2750) to increase the pension of Samuel A. Tate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel A. Tate, late of Company I, of the Fortieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pensioned under certificate No. 321486, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The committee beg leave to report that they have considered this case, and adopt the report of the Senate as their report herein, and recommend that said bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 1300, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2750) to increase the pension of Samuel A. Tate, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant under the bill was enlisted in Company I, Fortieth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, October 17, 1861, and was discharged July 24, 1865. During service he was attacked with typhoid fever, resulting in weakness of the back, which, on examination, was determined to be lumbago, and for which he was pensioned from June 12, 1884, first at $4, and afterwards at $8 per month. February 1, 1887, claimant filed declaration for increase for disease of spine and effects, results of typhoid fever, instead of lumbago, which application was rejected January 28, 1888. The bill is for the increase which was disallowed by the Pension Bureau.

No question exists as to the incurrence in the service of disease, by whatever name it may be designated, nor as to its continuance since service; nor as to the fact of extreme disability to which it subjects the claimant. It is clear on its face that the present allowance is out of correspondence with the suffering and disability. Four official and two lay examinations have demonstrated the fact of claimant's incompetency to support himself by manual labor. The results of the last official examination, made by a medical board October 19, 1887, are certified as follows:

"General appearance very bad. Flat-breasted, pale, enæmic, emaciated; muscles very soft and flabby; thick breathing, coughs, expectorates a thick phlegm mixed with mucus; tender on pressure over the clavicle region; tender over all the muscles of back on left side of spinal column and at sacroiliac junctures; all the lumbar vertebræ are prominent and tender on pressure; stomach, liver, and spleen all enlarged, and tender on pressure; dull on percussion over apex left lung, with marked crepitation; in some prolonged expiratory murmur, and increased vocal resonance in some; respiratory murmur rough and jerky or rather wany in right lung, but resonant on percussion. Forced respiration; expiration 32 inches, inspiration 33 inches, repose 32½. Has four internal pile sacks, ulcerating in centers. Heart's action irregular and jerky, giving an impulse to the entire precordial region. He is wrecked mentally and physically. Has asthma at times.

"He is in our opinion entitled to an eight-eighteenth rating for the disability caused by lumbago, four-eighteenths for that caused by disease of lungs, four-eighteenths caused by piles, two-eighteenths disease of spine, eight-eighteenths of third-grade disability equivalent to the loss of a hand or a foot."

Whatever question there may be about the character of the original ailment, there is, under the evidence, no doubt that the claimant's present disabilities are in the direct line of descent from his army service, and the man who is by virtue of such service "wrecked mentally and physically," is entitled to a higher pension than he now receives.

The committee report favorably upon the bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RACHEL ROGERS.

Mr. LANE. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10171) granting a pension to Rachel Rogers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel Rogers, dependent mother of Jeremiah T. Rogers, late sergeant of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The committee, in considering this case, find from the evidence that Jeremiah T. Rogers was sergeant of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and the claimant herein is his mother. The soldier was drawing a pension from the Government in his life-time, and he died February 26, 1886, of lung disease, which he contracted in the Army and while in line of duty. The mother is now seventy-four years of age, and while as a matter of fact in the life-time of the soldier and while he was in the service of the Government she was not depending on him for her support, the evidence now before the committee shows that she is very poor and has no means of support and is unable to labor, and that there is no person legally liable to support her.

In view of the facts in this case the committee recommend that this bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN N. BOVEE.

Mr. LYMAN. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 3018) granting n increase of pension to John N. Bovee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John N. Bovee, late of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, from $30 to $40 per month.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is full and accurate, and we adopt and submit it to the House, namely:

"Claimant enlisted in Company E, Eighteenth New York Volunteer Infantry, May 17, 1861, and was discharged from the service on surgeon's certificate of disability September 15, 1862. He was wounded in the service, necessitating the amputation of his right leg, for which he is now receiving a pension of $30 per month.

"In a letter dated May, 1888, claimant states that his leg has broken out every summer since the time it was amputated, and that it is constantly sloughing off, causing him severe pain all the time; that he applied to the Commissioner of Pensions for an increase, and was informed by him that there is no law authorizing the increase requested by claimant; that he respectfully asks Congress to allow him $10 per month in addition to the $30 now received by him.

"In a letter dated May 11, 1888, Dr. R. M. O'Reilly, of Washington, D. C., certifies that he has made a careful examination of claimant's right leg, and from the appearance of the limb it is evident that extensive sloughing has taken place and that it is apparently a case of irritable stump, and affiant presumes that superficial ulceration of an obstinate character occurs as a result of general physical depression, caused by hot weather. This opinion is concurred in by Dr. H. C. Yarrow and Dr. James T. Young, both of Washington, D. C.

"In a letter dated June 12, 1888, Dr. D. W. Bliss, of Washington, D. C., certifies that he has carefully examined the amputated leg stump of John N. Bovee, and finds that he has chronic eczema of the stump, which is more pronounced during the heated term, and so situated as to render the patient unable to bear an artificial limb; that the present appearance of the stump indicates that there was extensive sloughing of the soft parts immediately or soon after the amputation, which renders the use of an artificial limb of little value, as the stump will not bear the friction of its presence.

"The facts in the case warrant favorable action, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET HEINTZELMAN.

Mr. MACDONALD. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2726) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Heintzelman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret S. Heintzelman, widow of Major-General Samuel P. Heintzelman, deceased, and pay her a pension at the rate of $100 per month, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of $50 per month provided for in the act of Congress approved December 23, 1880.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

After a careful consideration of this case, the committee are of the opinion that the relief asked for ought to be granted, and therefore adopt the Senate report hereto appended, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 1475, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The bill to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Margaret S. Heintzelman, widow of the late Maj. Gen. Samuel P. Heintzelman, deceased, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $100 per month from and after the passage of this act, is most meritorious, and your committee is of the opinion that it should pass.

General Heintzelman entered the military service on July 1, 1822. He served with distinction in the Florida war, in the war with Mexico, and in expeditions against the Indians in California and Oregon. In May, 1861, he was appointed colonel United States Army and brigadier-general of the United States Volunteers, and in May, 1862, major-general of volunteers, and was engaged during the greater part of the late civil war in active field operations. At the battle of Bull Run, July, 1861, where he was wounded, and the Virginia peninsular campaign, in command of the Third Army Corps; at the siege of Yorktown; at the battle of Williamsburgh; at the battle of Fair Oaks; at the battle of Gaines's Mills, and at the battles of Savage Station, Glendale, where he was contused, and of Malvern Hill, in the Northern Virginia campaign, in the fall of 1862; at the battle of Manassas, August, 1862, and at the battle of Chantilly. He afterwards commanded the defense of Washington and the Department of Washington, and the Twenty-second Army Corps. He was breveted brigadier-general of the United States Army for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Fair Oaks, and major-general of the United States Army for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Williamsburgh.

After the close of the war he was in command in Texas and elsewhere until he was retired, by an especial act of Congress, as major-general, for wounds received in the line of duty.

On the 1st of May, 1880, General Heintzelman died of disease contracted while in military service and the result of extreme exposure in the line of duty, and of wounds, as detailed above. Especial reference is made to the general orders issued by General Sherman (copy herewith attached) on the death of General Heintzelman, in which, summing up the extraordinary services rendered, General Sherman said: "When the war closed no name on our register bore a more honorable record."

Mrs. Heintzelman is now receiving a pension at the rate of $50 per month, but your committee consider that it is but just to her in her declining years to be paid a sum adequate to her needs, which her present pension does not meet.

The long and eminent service of her late husband, the wounds received and disease contracted while fighting the battles of his conntry, are deemed to be sufficient grounds for the increase asked for.

[General Orders No. 30.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OEFICE,
Washington, May 1, 1880.

The General announces to the Army and the country the death of Maj. Gen. Samuel P. Heintzelman (retired), at his residence in this city at 1 o'clock this morning, at the age of seventy-five years.

Thus parts another link in the golden chain of memory which binds us to the past, and naught now remains of this noble soldier and gentleman except his example and the record of deeds which have contributed largely to the development and glory of his country in the last half century.

Samuel P. Heintzelman was born at Mannheim, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, September 30, 1805; entered the military academy at West Point July 1, 1822; graduated in 1826; commissioned as brevet second lieutenant Third Infantry and second lieutenant Second Infantry July 1, 1826. In this capacity he served on the northern frontier at Forts Gratiot, Mackinac, and Brady, when, on the 4th of March, 1833, he was appointed first lieutenant, and served on quartermaster's duty in Florida and the Creek country.

On the 7th of July, 1838, he was commissioned as captain of the staff in the Quartermaster's Department, remaining in Florida till the close of that war in 1842, and in 1847 joined General Scott's army in Mexico, taking an active part in several engagements, for which he was brevetted major October 9, 1847.

In 1848-'49 he accompanied his regiment around Cape Horn to California, and for several years was very busily employed in what is now the Territory of Arizona, receiving the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for his conduct in the campaign against the Yuma Indians, which terminated hostilities in that quarter.

March 3, 1855, he was promoted to major of the First Infantry, and served with that regiment on the Texas frontier, rendering most valuable service against the organized marauders under Cortinas, and contributing largely to the safety of that newly-acquired region of our country.

The civil war of 1861 found him at Fort Columbus, New York Harbor, superintending the general recruiting service, and with the ardor of his nature, and with his whole soul and might he embarked in that terrible conflict; first, appointed colonel of the now Seventeenth Infantry, he was rapidly advanced to brigadier and major general, holding high and important commands throughout the entire war, attaining the rank of major-general of volunteers, and brevet major-general of the regular Army. A record of these services would pass the limits of this obituary notice, but when the war closed no name on our register bore a more honorable record.

On the 22d of February, 1869, having attained the age of sixty-five, and having served continuously in the Army forty-five years, he voluntarily retired, as major-general, and has since spent most of his time here in Washington till this bright day of May, 1880.

General Heintzelman was a man of an intense nature, of vehement action, guided by sound judgment and a cultivated taste. Universally respected and beloved, at a ripe old age he leaves us, universally regretted. "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." May our end be as peaceful and as much deplored as his.

The funeral will take place from his residence, No. 1123 Fourteenth street, at 9 a. m., on Monday, May 3 instant, and will be escorted to the Sixth-street depot by a battalion of the Marine Corps and a battalion of the Second Artillery. The commanding officer of the artillery troops at the Washington Arsenal will detail an officer, a non-commissioned officer, and three men to accompany the remains to Buffalo for final interment.

The officers of the Army in this city are requested to attend the funeral ceremonies on Monday.

By command of General Sherman.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. It was understood, Mr. Chairman, when this bill passed the committee that it should be amended by striking out "$100" and inserting "$75." Through some inadvertence it is not so reported; but in order to carry out the instructions of the committee I move to amend the bill in that respect by striking out "$100" and inserting "$75," in the seventh line.

Mr. MACDONALD. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JANE E. KNOBLE.

Mr. MAISH. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10708) granting a pension to Jane E. Knoble.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Jane E. Knoble, widow of Samuel Knoble, late a private in the Eighty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws,

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

Jane E. Knoble is the widow of Samuel Knoble, a private of the Eighty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, who enlisted September 15, 1861, in the war of the rebellion, and was discharged July 25, 1862. He applied for pension August 12, 1869, which was granted in the Pension Department July 7, 1875. Soldier died April 29, 1886. He received injury in the service, in line of duty, but right inguinal hernia was undoubtedly the cause of his death. His pension was increased April 3, 1884, for other diseases, total from April 3, 1884, and from other evidence on file it is plainly shown that his disease was a progressive one, and that it got worse all the time, until finally it resulted in his death.

Special Pension Examiner E. D. Pinkerton says that the testimony seems to settle that soldier's hernia was the cause of his death. But the family physician who attended him in his last sickness does not state clearly the pathological connection between the hernia, for which the soldier was pensioned, as the immediate cause of his death, which he alleges to have been severe hemorrhage of the bowels, and at another time states that he thinks the patient had consumption (tuberculosis), but he considers that the hernia trouble hastened it. He says that he considered that the soldier acquired consumption; that he first noticed a tendency to consumption three years prior to his death. This testimony was given by Dr. N. Sager, jr., who attended said soldier in his last illness prior to his death. But it appears from an affidavit on file that Dr. N. Sager, sr., the father of N. Sager, jr., who was practicing medicine in company with his son, who testifies as follows:

"I am sixty-nine years old; occupation, practicing physician. I have known Samuel Knoble for about twenty-five years. I remember when he came home from the service that he complained considerably of his head, was hard of hearing, and was also afflicted with hernia. I was his family physician. He told me his hernia was incurred in the Army. He continually grew worse after his arrrival home and would have distressing spells, and I would be called to treat him. His death was undoubtedly the result of the hernia."

In answer to a question he contradicts his son's statement, and says: "No, I do not think he had consumption." He finally, prior to his death, became very deaf. In an affidavit prior to the death of the soldier, this same physician states:

"I have frequently prescribed and examined Samuel Knoble, or above-named soldier, who suffered on account of hernia. There are times when he is entirely laid up from it, and in some instances even endangers his life. He is not able at any time to perform any hard manual labor, and on account of deformity can wear no truss to any good purpose. He resides in this village and has for the past twenty-two years. I have been his family physician all that time," etc.

On this affidavit the pension of the soldier was increased at that time. This clearly indicates by the evidence that the doctor, prior to his death, when he said that his hernia sometimes endangered his life, that his diagnoses were correct and that his death resulted as he predicted, in consequence of hernia. This claim was rejected solely on the evidence of the doctor's son, who, it is no doubt, made a mistake in his diagnoses when he connected the death of this man with tuberculosis, which squarely contradicted the evidence of his father. Your committee is of the opinion that this case should have been allowed in the Pension Office on the evidence on file, but as it was not, there is not a particle of doubt in the minds of your committee but what that this is a meritorious case, and earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER LINER.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9106) granting a pension to Peter Liner.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter Liner, late a member of Company D, Seventh Regiment Regular United States Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

Peter Liner enlisted in Company D, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, August 14, 1871, and was discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability April 23, 1875, because of loss of left hand, except index finger and thumb.

His claim therefor has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the wound was received by the bursting of a shot-gun while hunting.

It appears from the testimony of Maj. M. A. Reno that claimant was quartermaster sergeant of the company, and while in charge of the wagons on the march from Sweet Pass Hills to Fort Totten, Dak., he was wounded in left hand by the explosion of a breech-loading gun.

The claimant was without medical assistance for four days after the accident, because there was no medical officer with the command.

It is no uncommon thing for troops while on the march through a country invested with game to hunt, and thus obtain fresh meat. In fact it is not only permitted, but in many instances regular details are made for that purpose. Claimant alleges that he had permission, at the time of the injury, from his captain, who is now dead. The gun was one furnished by the Government, and was unquestionably defective. Could claimant show that he had permission from his commanding officer to hunt for the benefit of the command, his claim would be admissible under the rules of the Pension Office. This, however, can not now be done.

The claimant is a man of excellent character. He served with credit a five years' enlistment prior to his enlistment in August, 1871, and was intrusted with the responsible duties of quartermaster sergeant at the time of the accident.

His allegations as to the circumstances under which he went on a hunt are not contradicted, and it is hardly possible that he could have had any other intent than to let the men under him share in the game which he could secure.

It is the opinion of your committee that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CATHARINE TEEGARDIN.

Mr. MCMILLIN. At the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YODER] I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10827) for the relief of Catharine Teegardin. I know nothing of the merits of the claim, but the report will show its character.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Teegardin, widow of the late Peter Teegardin, who was a member of Company D, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and whose pension certificate was numbered 328568.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

Catharine Teegardin is the widow of Peter Teegardin, a private of Company D, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Peter Teegardin enlisted August 11, 1862, discharged June 24, 1865, and died August 22, 1882. Widow filed application for pension July 6, 1885. The soldier previously filed application for invalid's pension November 7, 1878, and was pensioned for disease of the lungs. The widow's pension was rejected solely on the ground of the statement that the soldier died from a lumbar abscess and that the disease for which he was pensioned was not the immediate cause of his death.

After a careful investigation of the evidence on file your committee are clearly of the opinion that the cause of his death, as stated by his family physician as having resulted from the lumbar abscess, is very doubtful, from the fact that he makes several statements in which he contradicts his diagnoses of the cause of death, and also states that he had but a limited means or opportunity of seeing the claimant's husband during his last illness, saying that he had only seen him occasionally; that he was not his regular physician. Yet on this statement alone, which was contradicted by other evidence, the widow's pension claim was rejected, according to the evidence on file.

After a careful investigation, your committee have come to the conclusion that this is a meritorious claim, and that while the construction of evidence weighed in the Pension Department, which was given by this medical evidence, was the sole cause for rejection, we are clearly of the opinion that it is not worth anything as proper evidence; and as it was on this evidence alone that her claim was rejected, it leaves, to say the least, a very grave doubt as to the justice in rejecting the claim by the Pension Department.

Your committee are strongly of the opinion that this is a clear case that merits the intervention of Congress and granting her pension by special act. This man suffered from disease of the lungs, which he contracted in the line of duty in the Army, for which he was pensioned, which disabled him from accumulating any means to provide for the maintenance of his family after his decease; in fact was a charge upon his wife while living, and when he died he left his wife needy and without any means of self-support. Your committe therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CATHARINE MULLIGAN.

Mr. MOFFITT. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10173) granting a pension to Catharine Mulligan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Mulligan, mother of Patrick Mulligan, late a private of Company M, Fourteenth New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10173) granting a pension to Catherine Mulligan, submit the following report:

The chief of the eastern division of the Pension Office makes the following statement of this case, under the date of January 25, 1888:

"Respectfully submitted to the chief of the board of review, calling attention to the attorney's letter showing the claimant's age over eighty years, that she is a cripple, unable to work, totally without means, entirely dependent on charity. Her son-in-law, who seems to be her main support, is said to be poor and sick and has a family of his own."

The beneficiary filed her application for a pension January 19, 1886. The Adjutant-General reports as follows:

"Regimental hospital records show him admitted December 23, 1864, with accidental gunshot wound of abdomen, and sent to First Division Field Hospital, Ninth Army Corps, Virginia, same date, and died from wound received December 26, 1864. Company and regimental lists of casualties show him died in First Division, Ninth Army Corps Hospital, Virginia, December 26, 1864, of accidental wound received at Fort Haskell, Va., December 25, 1864. Circumstances attending accident not stated."

The following is the manner of his death as shown by C. C. Eddy, lieutenant of soldier's company, who testifies as follows:

"That said Mulligan was shot at guard mount of December 25, 1864, by accidental discharge of a comrade's gun, he pointing his gun at him in fun, supposing it was not loaded, he being one of the guard at Fort Haskell, Va. This I know of my own personal knowledge."

The same officer, in a letter to the Commissioner of date July 28, 1887, writes: "It was not known that there was any quarrel or hard feelings, but were the best of friends. It was so evident that it was purely accidental that O'Brien was not put in arrest."

The soldier enlisted December 16, 1863, and was a private in Company M, Fourteenth New York Heavy Artillery. The fact of the soldier's death in the manner above stated by the accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of a comrade, with whom he was on friendly terms, that it was not while engaged in any quarrel or dispute, is clearly and fully shown.

The mother's claim was rejected solely on the ground "that the soldier died from a wound which was not received in the line of duty." The soldier was never married.

The fact of the extreme age of the widowed mother, her perfect dependence, and her crippled condition are all fully shown, and the committee fully believe that this poor, crippled old mother is most clearly entitled to the relief asked for, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY STURGESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2913) granting a pension to Mary Sturgess.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Sturgess, a volunteer nurse in the late war, and pay her a pension of at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is adopted and the passage of the bill is recommended.

SENATE REPORT.

This bill proposes to pension, at the rate of $12 per month, Mary Sturgess, a volunteer nurse in the late war. James E. Yeatman, president of the Western Sanitary Commission and authorized agent of Miss D. L. Dix, of the Western Department, certifies—

"That Mary Sturgess, in the fall of 1861, was appointed a nurse for military hospital, and was assigned for duty in Thomas Hospital, and served as such at Paducah, and subsequently at hospital in Memphis, and was favorably reported as a nurse of superior ability by Major Irwin, in charge of hospital at Memphis."

This is fully corroborated by Mrs. M. A. Bickerdyke as to her services in the hospitals at Paducah and Memphis. She is now seventy-seven years old, very poor and feeble.

There can be no good reason assigned why this brave old woman should not have a pension, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to amend that bill by striking out "$12 per month" and inserting "$50 per month."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, that is a higher pension than the committee have ever awarded to nurses; and I move therefore to amend the amendment by inserting "25" in lieu of "50;" so that it will read $25 per month.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. MAISH. That fixes the amount at $25 per month.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEAVER in the chair). That is correct.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JESSE L. GARRETT.

Mr. NICHOLS. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3908) increasing the pension of Jesse L. Garrett.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Jesse L. Garrett, formerly of the United States Marine Corps, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. BUTLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3908) granting an increase of pension to Jesse L. Garrett, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant was a private in the Marine Corps, United States Navy, and served on board the steamer Jamestown and with the Marine Battalion for duty with the Army in Mexico. His term of service extended from September 5, 1844, to August 18, 1848. He is now in receipt of a pension at the rate of $8 per month under the Mexican service act.

Mr. Garrett claims that he is entitled to an increase of pension because of his age and disability. He is sixty-four years of age, a printer by trade, but now without occupation, having been discharged from the Government Printing Office.

His hands and feet are both distorted as a result of rheumatism.

The examining board at Washington, D. C., in November, 1866, reported as follows:

"Both hands are deformed by calcareous deposits about the joints, particularly the metacarpo-phalangeal articulations. Can flex, but can not extend fully the middle, ring, and little fingers of left hand, nor the ring and middle fingers of right hand. Joints of feet also distorted."

There is no evidence to show that the said disease had its origin in the man's naval service, but your committee, having seen the man and observed his physical condition, are satisfied that he can not make a living. His disease is a permanent one, and will rather increase than decrease in its severity. He is without property or income beyond his present small pension.

Your committee therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "thirty," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, as a further amendment, to add to the bill the words:

In lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

He is already on the pension-roll, and this bill, if adopted in its present form, would put him on the pension-roll again and give him a double pension.

Mr. NICHOLS. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

H. R. BLAKISTON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 1988) granting a pension to H. R. Blakiston.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $72 per month, the name of H. R. Blakiston, late an acting master in the United States Navy.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1988) granting an increased pension to Henry R. Blakiston, have considered the same, and report the bill back to the House, recommending its passage.

They adopt as their report the naval history of the claimant, as given in a letter from the honorable Fourth Auditor of the Treasury and the report of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate on this matter, as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., June 13, 1888.

"Very respectfully,

"C. M. SHELLEY, Auditor.

"W. C. WHITNEY, Secretary of the Navy."

[Senate Report No. 1011, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant enlisted as quartermaster January 9, 1847, and was discharged April 26, 1848. He was assigned to the steamers Petrita and the Mississippi. He applied for a pension as a survivor of the Mexican war, under the act of January 29, 1887. He filed his declaration March 4, 1887. A pension was granted him March 9, 1877. His age is seventy-one years and eleven months.

The bill introduced for his relief proposes to put him upon the pension-roll at the rate of $72 per month. The evidence filed since the granting of his pension shows that he is at this time totally disabled by blindness. The certificate under oath of Dr. W. W. Keene alleges:

"I have not the slightest doubt that his present disabilities are in most part the direct result of his hardships and exposure during his active service in the United States Navy."

This opinion of the physician is based upon his hospital record, which he has examined.

The provisions of the act of January 29, 1887, makes no distinction by reason of the character of the disability incurred in the service in the Mexican war, but grants to all soldiers who are now disabled, or over sixty-two years of age, a pension of $8 per month.

The claimant further alleges in a letter that he was a veteran volunteer of three wars, "Florida, Mexico, and the late rebellion," and further alleges:

"My present physical condition has been brought about principally, if not entirely, by active service and exposure in the Mexican war."

There is no proof in the papers except this allegation of the claimant that he served in any war except that with Mexico. If he served in the war of the rebellion and can trace his blindness to "injury received or disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty," he would be entitled to a pension as asked in the bill, but under the rule adopted by the committee his application should first be made to the Pension Bureau.

The only question presented by this record is, shall the committee, where the proof shows total blindness resulting from service in the Mexican war, give to the claimant a pension equal to that provided by law for total blindness caused by injury received or disease contracted in the late rebellion.

Two cases of this character, namely, of total blindness as the result of services in the Mexican war, have been passed upon by this committee during this session—that of Martin N. Kellogg and that of Titus Wilder. In the present case, as in those, your committee perceive no reason why such an appalling affliction should not entitle the claimant to the same measure of gratitude, no matter in what war incurred, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the title so that it will read "Henry R. Blakiston."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. As the bill I desire to call up is the bill providing a pension for Mrs. Adeline Couzins, which has been reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole, I move that the committee do rise and consider it at this time in the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WEAVER reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

MRS. ADELINE COUZINS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I now ask consideration of the bill (S. 2356) to provide a pension for Mrs. Adeline Couzins.

Mr. CHEADLE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHEADLE. Is not the first business in order to dispose of the bills considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is if the point is made.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] to withdraw his objection to the passage of this bill at this time. He gave me his word to-night that he would not object.

Mr. CHEADLE. Let us first go on and dispose of the business reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask to have my name passed over without losing the privilege of calling up a bill.

There was no objection.

MRS. SUSAN BATES.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9370) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Bates, widow of Thomas Bates, late private Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan Bates, widow of Thomas Bates, late private Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Thomas Bates, husband of Susan Bates was pensioned at the rate of $4 per month, for chronic diarrhea. The widow filed claim for pension, alleging that soldier died from the effect of the disease for which he was pensioned. The claim was rejected on the ground that it was not proved that the disease which caused the husband's death was the same as that contracted in the military service.

Dr. L. F. Ingersoll, the physician who attended the soldier during his last illness, testifies that—

"The immediate cause of his death was pneumonia. About January 14, 1883, Dr. Kneeland sent medicines for what he supposed was a simple bronchitis, and January 21 I visited Thomas Bates, being the first and only physician who visited him in his last illness. I found him with respiration about 30, pulse about 160 per minute, and evidence of consolidation of the lower half of right lung. The amount of consolidation (the amount of lung tissue being healthy) I could not deem sufficient in a person of average strength to have caused the evidence of great prostration found in Mr. Bates.

"The chronic diarrhea always kept him reduced in flesh and enfeebled him so as to unfit him for any hard work. The pneumonia trouble attacking him so enfeebled produced the result that otherwise, in all probability, would not have been. January 23, 1883, I visited him again, but found him still weaker, and in a few hours he died."

The reason of the rejection of the claim by the department was the opinion of the medical referee that the immediate cause of his death, pneumonia, could not be accepted as a sequel of the chronic diarrhea, which, in the opinion of the committee, is not of sufficient weight in a pathological sense to cause a rejection of the claim.

The committee therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WALTER O. WATSON.

Mr. PETERS. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 200) granting a pension to Walter O. Watson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Walter O. Watson, late a private in Company D, Fourteenth Regiment Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 200) granting a pension to Walter O. Watson, report as follows:

Applicant enlisted as private in Company D, Fourteenth Illinois Volunteers, September 11, 1862, and was discharged May 30, 1865. Filed declaration for pension March 15, 1879, claiming that in the winter of 1864 and 1865, while confined in Southern prisons at Andersonville and Millen, received injuries to his stomach.

His claim was rejected because there was no record of alleged disease and his inability to furnish the necessary evidence to connect it with the service. The evidence shows that soldier was captured October 4, 1864, and sent to Andersonville, and afterwards to Millen, and was paroled in April, 1865. The evidence also shows that claimant was free from stomach trouble at date of enlistment and up to time of capture.

The evidence of two comrades who were confined with him shows that he contracted disease of stomach in prison. The evidence of continuance of the disease from about time of discharge is sufficient, and the only question in the case is whether the evidence of two comrades as to incurrence of disease while a prisoner is sufficient. Of course, under the circumstances, no medical or record testimony of the incurrence of the disease is possible.

The evidence of the two comrades who were confined with applicant testify in substance as follows:

Julius Eldred says: Was a comrade and messmate of claimant while he was a prisoner at Andersonville, Ga., that he contracted disease of his stomach and kidneys by reason of hardship in said prison.

A. S. Wiles says: Was in Andersonville prison with the claimant and that he believes he contracted disease of stomach and kidneys while in said prison.

This evidence standing alone is not very strong, but when taken in connection with the evidence showing that claimant was sound at enlistment and continued to perform the arduous duties of a soldier in active service up to the time of his capture; that he was confined in prison for nearly six months; that at the time of his return home, shortly after his parole and discharge from prison, he was sick with stomach disease; that he has never been a well man since, but has continually suffered from stomach troubles, your committee feel fully justified in concluding that the disease of stomach originated while in prison, and therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration various bills, and instructed him to report them with sundry recommendations.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 2576) granting a pension to Richard Hudson;

A bill (S. 3186) granting a pension to Christian Winkel; and

A bill (S. 2750) to increase the pension of Samuel A. Tate.

JOHN N. BOVEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House is the bill (S. 3018) granting an increase of pension to John N. Bovee.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to oppose that bill; and I do so upon the statement contained in a letter furnished by one J. Jones, an old soldier. I will send it up to the Clerk's desk and have it read. If the facts stated in that letter be true, then that increase ought not to be granted.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: I see that a favorable report has been made by the Committee on Pensions to increase the pension of John N. Bovee. (See Senate bill No. 3018, and House report No. 3329.)

Mr. Bovee already receives a liberal pension ($30 per month). He now receives, and has been for years, a salary of $1,600 per annum in the War Records Office, War Department, runs a Turkish bath (in his wife's name) on G street near Fifteenth, and owns valuable real estate at Washington Grove, Takoma Park, etc. Do you think this man, who has been drawing a salary (in addition to his present liberal pension) from the Government since the close of the war, ought to have his pension increased, while hundreds of worthy indigent soldiers are suffering?

Dr. O'Reilly, in his report, says: * * * "From appearances, etc., it is evident * * * and affiant presumes that superficial ulceration occurs, etc., in hot weather." The doctor is not positive in this case.

Dr. D. W. Bliss, one of his most intimate friends, says: * * * "which renders the use of an artificial limb of little value, as the stump will not bear the friction of its presence."

The facts are these: The only times that he has been known to cast aside his artifical limb were while working in the Government Printing Office. If a furlough or reduction of force was spoken of he found it expedient to resume the crutch until the scare passed over. Also during the twelve years he has been in his present position the same tactics have been resorted to with success.

He now receives from the Government $1,960 yearly as salary and pension; also every five years the price of a new limb (including railroad fare to and from the manufacturer) that he can not wear unless he gets an increase of $10 a month.

Respectfully,

J. JONES,
An Old Soldier.

Hon. C. B. KILGORE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over until the others reported from the Committee of the Whole House can be disposed of.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, were taken up, the amendments respectively agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to a third reading; and they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers;

A bill (S. 2726) granting an increase of pension to Margaret S. Heintzelman; and

A bill (S. 2913) granting a pension to Mary Sturgess.

H. R. BLAKISTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House is the bill (S. 1988) granting a pension to H. R. Blakiston; and the question is on the adoption of the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I now desire that the amendment which was agreed to in committee shall be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN N. BOVEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next bill for consideration is the bill (S. 3018) granting an increase of pension to John N. Bovee, and the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The question was put, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. TRACEY. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 14.

Mr. LYMAN. I called up that bill at the request of a Senator. It is a Senate bill and one I know nothing about; but if it can be passed over without being rejected until I can see the gentleman who asked me to call the bill up, I would be glad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will go over as unfinished business. The hour of half past 10 o'clock having arrived, the House, according to order, will stand adjourned.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. ENLOE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have reprinted the report of the Committee on War Claims on the claim of Hiram Johnson and others.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the order which has been made no such motion is necessary, because the Journal shows that the House is to resume the consideration of the pending bill after the reading of the Journal this morning.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I call up for consideration House bill 11309, to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, and American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN LANDS, WYOMING.

Pending the motion of Mr. McCREARY,

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11388) to withdraw certain public lands in the Territory of Wyoming from sale or disposition under the laws of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FISHERIES.

The motion of Mr. McCREARY was agreed to, and the House resumed the consideration of House bill 11309.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor, and I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, there is no man on either side of the House more thoroughly in favor of retaliation for the abuses of neighborly privileges in respect to our fisheries than I am, but I desire that it shall be a retaliation which retaliates, in the first place, and secondly, that it shall be a retaliation which retaliates upon the offenders and not upon our own people; and I propose to show, and I think to demonstrate, that the first section of this bill, if carried into effect, will inure to the benefit of the Dominion of Canada and to the permanent and lasting injury of the commerce of this country, of the laborers of this country, and of the general material interests of this country. If I fail to so demonstrate, I will vote for the bill, including the first section; and I would be glad to hear our friends who may favor the first section say that if I succeed in making this demonstration they wil vote against it.

Mr. WEAVER. Who is to be the judge?

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I will leave each one to judge for himself.

Mr. Speaker, the President has given his view of how retaliation should be made, which is in substance that it should be such as will inflict the greatest injury upon the enemy with the least injury to ourselves, and that it should, as far as possible, be retaliation in kind. With that view I most heartily agree. Now, sir, what are the grievances of which we complain? The maritime provinces of the Dominion of Canada, with thirty-five millions invested in shipping, a very large percentage of it in fishermen's vessels and outfits, have for some years been inflicting outrages upon our fishermen. With those outrages the northwestern provinces of the Dominion have had nothing to do.

Manitoba, the rich agricultural region of the Dominion, has not a fishing smack in the world, and Ontario has none except those that are engaged in the lake fisheries, as to which there is no controversy. The western portion of Quebec has none. The only provinces that do have any are Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and the eastern portion of the Province of Quebec, bordering on the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Chaleur. Now, the message recommends the stoppage of the shipment of freight and goods in bond arriving at ports of the United States intended for the consumption or the benefit of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

There never has been a pound of freight received at the three designated ports, Portland, Boston, and New York—and they are all the American ports, with the exception of San Francisco, which have the privilege, the great ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore not having it—I say there has never been a pound of freight received at any one of those ports for transshipment to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, or to New Brunswick, and it is the height of absurdity to talk about receiving goods at our ports destined for the people of the irritating portion of the Dominion of Canada, the people who have been inflicting these injuries upon us. The goods that come into our ports are intended, some for the western portion of the Province of Quebec, Montreal, and its neighborhood, but they are mostly for Ontario, because Montreal has her own shipping connections with the sea and railroad communication with the ports of the lower provinces by means of the Intercolonial Railroad. These goods, I say, are mainly intended for Ontario and for Manitoba, and when you retaliate by stopping this transportation you do not hurt a hair of the head of a single one of the Bluenose fishermen that have been wantonly assailing our rights for the last three years.

But you do hurt; you make it a little more serious expenditure on the part of the inhabitants of the Northwestern provinces, who have not committed a single grievance against us. But what do you do to America? I have taken a little pains to collect a few statistics in regard to that. The President informs us that in six years there has come over here $270,000,000 worth of goods to be transferred to the Dominion of Canada; that is $45,000,000 per year. It is a fair estimate on the valuation of freight, including steel rails at $25 to $35 per ton, and running up to dry-goods, which will average about $200 per ton, that the average value of a ton of freight will be $100. That gives us 450,000 tons per year, there having been $45,000,000 worth per year received during the six years. These 450,000 tons per year are received and handled by whom? When the ship lands at New York or Boston the stevedore who transfers the freight from the ship to the dock is an American workman; the drayman who carts the freight from the dock to the railroad or to the bonded warehouse is an American workman. The commission merchant who pays the charges and makes the advance for sending forward this freight is an American merchant, and the railroad which transports the property through our country is an American railroad.

I have taken the pains to find out what the average profit during the last five years has been per ton per mile for the shipment of freight, and I find from Poor's Manual that it has averaged one and fifteen one-hundredth cents per ton. Applying the figures which result from this, we have for payment to the railroads of this country for handling this freight, estimating the average haul to be, as it is, about 600 miles in American territory, $3,105,000, all of it profit. This is not the amount which was received; certain amounts were received and paid out; but the profit on handling this freight was $3,105,000. The cartage of 450,000 tons of freight at $1 per ton, and that is a very low estimate, as every man knows who has ever moved freight through a city, would be $450,000, every cent of it taken from the American cartman, the carts driven by American laborers, receiving their daily support by the amount of work their employers can furnish them. Further than that, the bare lifting of the freight out of the ship by the stevedores and the longshoremen at 33 cents per ton (and this is a low estimate; the facts, I think, will show this below the proper figure) would be $150,000 per year, paid largely to my constituents, many of whom are longshoremen, for lifting the freight out of the vessel and getting it on its way.

I think I have shown, Mr. Speaker, that while under the operation of this measure the province of Manitoba may pay more for the transfer of its freight, we on our part will lose more than three million and a half dollars per year—a loss to American workmen—by the carrying into effect of the provisions of this intended law. Now, what is the effect of that upon the Dominion? The President, on page 4 of his message, uses this language:

> For a considerable portion of each year the St. Lawrence River, which constitutes the direct avenue of foreign commerce leading to Canada, is closed by ice.

Does that stop their receipts in the Dominion of Canada during that portion of the year? I propose to send to the desk to have read an article from a book which I believe has received high Presidential sanction. I think extracts from it may possibly have adorned Presidential rhetoric, and I can only regret that the haste of its examination should have caused the President to skip the letter "H," under which he would have found the article on Halifax, and to go ahead of it to Indianapolis, which comes one letter later in the alphabet. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I have marked from the American Cyclopædia in regard to the character of the Halifax harbor.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The harbor of Halifax is one of the best in the world. It extends about 16 miles inland, is accessible at all times; and opposite the city, where vessels usually anchor, is about 1 mile wide. Farther up it contracts to one-quarter mile in width, and finally expands into a beautiful sheet of water, called Bedford basin, comprising an area of about 10 square miles. A small arm branching off from the harbor a short distance below the city extends inland to within one-half mile of this basin, forming a peninsula, on which the city is built. The harbor contains McNab's and three or four smaller islands, has two light-houses, and is defended by several fortifications of considerable strength. There are two passages into the harbor, one on each side of McNab's Island. The western is commanded by Fort George and several batteries; the eastern, which has sufficient depth of water only for small vessels, lies under the guns of a formidable stone fort called Fort Clarence. Halifax is largely interested in the fisheries.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, running from Halifax across the province of Nova Scotia, our most irritating neighbor, across the province of New Brunswick, our next most irritating neighbor, and into the province of Quebec to Point Levi, opposite the city of Quebec, extends the Intercolonial Railway, 678 miles in length, with the harbor of Halifax, the best in the world, open at all seasons of the year, ready to pour into the Intercolonial Railway all the wealth which otherwise would have come over American railroads and been handled by American workmen—ready to furnish labor to the "Bluenose" fishermen at the period of the year when they can not follow the sea, and must, from the nature of things, be looking for work. That is "retaliation" with a vengeance!

Take away the bread out of the mouths of our own laborers and increase the expenditures of Manitoba and Ontario, because, forsooth, some fishermen have interfered with our rights in the maritime provinces, and in retaliation you give them work for five months in the year when they otherwise would not have anything to do? Is that wise?

Again, the Intercolonial Railway is owned and operated by these provinces, and these, at least during the winter, would have this increased volume of $3,105,000 worth of traffic plus the increased charges which they, having a monopoly, could add upon the people of Ontario and Manitoba, and which they would be powerless to resist because of the existence of the monopoly. Again, that is your retaliation with a vengeance.

Mr. Speaker, I have indulged my fancy a little in the draught of a diplomatic note, in order to convey the astounding intelligence to Her Majesty's Government that we are going to commence this style of retaliation; and if it should be necessary, I will not claim the right that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] claimed on yesterday, I will not copyright it, but will leave it free and at the service of the Department:

HON. Sir LIONEL SACKVILLE WEST,
Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty:

SIR KNIGHT: The President instructs me to inform Her Majesty's Government that owing to the action of the maritime provinces of the Dominion of Canada towards this country in the violation of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty between Her Majesty's Government and the United States, concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, in refusing to permit the transshipment of fish in bond through said provinces without the payment of duties, and further owing to wrongful seizures and false arrests and illegal fines and imprisonments imposed by said maritime provinces upon American fishermen and ship-owners, and especially by the province of Nova Scotia, in the capital of which the principal aggressive and illegal acts were performed, the Government of the United States has authorized him to retaliate, and acting in behalf of this Government, he feels that such acts of retaliation shall be put in force as will most seriously damage the aggressors.

Acting under this motive the President has determined that all goods, wares, and merchandise intended for the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, and Winnipeg, which have heretofore been freely received at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and which have heretofore been cheerfully handled by American workmen and transported upon American railroads, shall hereafter be landed only at the ports of Halifax and St. John, in the offending maritime provinces aforesaid, and shall be handled only by Canadian workmen and transported only by the Intercolonial Railroad, which, I need not inform Her Majesty's Government, is owned and operated by said Dominion.

The President can not but regret the severity of this measure, but he feels, as expressed in the language of Her Majesty's greatest poet, that he "must be cruel only to be kind," and he begs to express the hope that this damage inflicted upon the great northwestern provinces of the Dominion will speedily cause the maritime provinces to cease their unjust acts towards our fishermen.

The President further hopes that pending this result Her Majesty's Government will not overlook the fact that stern justice is not wholly unmixed with mercy, as what the northwestern provinces lose the maritime provinces gain, and Her Majesty's possessions in North America are thereby kept, as it were, upon an even keel.

With great personal respect, I remain, your and Her Majesty's obedient servant and friend, (Presumably to be signed) THOS. F. BAYARD,

Secretary of State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have exhausted as much time as I feel that I can afford to occupy at present out of the limited space at my command in the discussion of the questions raised by the first section of the bill. With the second section of the bill I am in thorough and hearty accord, but the question comes and has come to me whether I, under the solemnity of my oath of duty as a legislator on this floor, should cast my vote for a measure which I believe to be directly injurious and detrimental to the laboring men of my district and in behalf of what has been characterized by the eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as the beating of a gong in the presence of an enemy and furnishing another mallet for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I for one am in favor and heartily in favor of the cultivation of music; and if there is no better music than that of the Chinese gong, let those who enjoy that peculiar taste have the benefit of it; but I will never vote for putting the mallet into the hands of any man to beat a Chinese gong with who as he strikes the gong necessarily hits the head of some American workingman and strikes some American industry. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is probably true that the rarest combination of qualities to be found in this country, which has been called the "land of the free and the home of the brave," and when we have been upbraided with this name we have admitted it, is that of perfect freedom from the thraldom of one's surroundings and the bravery to disregard the possibilities of misconstruction of one's acts.

The man who shall be able to break the shackles of his environments and under all conditions to exercise absolute freedom of judgment and conscience, and who shall have the moral courage, everywhere and at all times, to do what he conceives to be wisest and best, leaving to time and to history the vindication of unpopular acts, such a man, sir, shall stand out as the embodiment of Juvenal's fancy—the "rara avis in terris, nigroque simillima cygno." Such a man I do not claim to be, but I am tough enough for this case.

Mr. Speaker, let me apply this thought to the pending legislation. I am one of those who believe that the legislation desired is unnecessary; nay, that it is worse than unnecessary; that it is positively unwise, and so clear is it to me that such is the case that I believe that if an unseen ballot, taken in the inner consciousness of each one of the members of this House could be taken, more than half of those who by their surroundings may be compelled to vote in favor of it would concur with me that it is unwise, or at least unnecessary.

But where, as in this case, the rights of American citizens have been wantonly assailed by an aggressive neighbor, and a too tardy reparation is being sought by our Government, the legislator is reluctant to take a step which can be misconstrued and may seem even for a moment to antagonize an honest effort to redress such wrongs.

But my convictions are so clear that the provisions of the first section of this bill are unwise, illogical, and wrong, that if I vote alone, as I probably shall, I shall vote against this bill as a whole, though I am heartily in accord with the second section.

I left out of its proper place one thought to which I wish to recur, and that is just how easy it is to inflict suitable injury to redress a wrong, or retaliate in effect upon the maritime provinces, and at the same time benefit our American ship-owners and fishermen who so sadly need such aid. There are seven thousand ships engaged in trade in the maritime provinces. There is not one of them that has been in commission a year which has not probably at some time or other visited an American port. The law of 1887, which has been in force now more than eighteen months, gives the right to the President to prohibit any ships from that nation coming to any of our ports. When you have enforced that exclusion, then you have struck a "Bluenose" where it hurts.

What else have you done? You will have enlarged the field of commerce to the extent which it was heretofore occupied by the Dominion shippers, and will have invited American ships to enter that field and resume their rightful place in the carrying trade. In one case you have removed competition and given Americans the chance of carrying, while in the other you have taken away the labor and wage of the workingman of America and given it to the maritime provinces of the Dominion. I favor retaliation of that kind which hurts somebody else, and that the offenders and not ourselves, and which induces some sort of anxiety on the part of the party against whom the retaliation is applied to seek a speedy means of relief.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Does not the Executive have the power to issue such an order, and adopt measures of exclusion such as the gentleman has referred to under the existing law?

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Of course under the existing law is what I had intended to say. I may have said under the bill; if so I correct it.

But, sir, I wish to call attention to another provision which shows how left-handed and awkward, in the attempt at retaliation, the President seems to be in getting in his work. Neither Philadelphia nor Baltimore have the right of receiving goods for transshipment to Canada. What other port has? San Francisco has that right since the 12th of March, 1887. What for? Because the Canadian Pacific Railroad had been opened and presented a formidable competitor to the American railroads. Under what condition was this competition inaugurated? The act of the 4th of February, 1887, known as the interstate-commerce law, was passed, the provisions of which I do not now criticise, although certain provisions of that law I believe to be unwise.

But in the main it worked well for the benefit of the whole people, and I therefore approve it. What did it do? It prevented pooling. That is right. It prevented discrimination between a long and short haul and it put shackles upon the hands of the roads, preventing any lowering of rates between terminal points below that of intermediate points. The Canadian Pacific, a line running for 2,700 miles through that uninhabitable region north of the Lake of the Woods, of Lake Superior, and across the great mountains, needed something. They could charge anything they pleased for local transportation, and this provision was made, after the retaliation law of 1887 was passed and after the interstate-commerce law had been passed, by the same man who now asks us to pass this retaliation law; the port of San Francisco was made a port from which goods might be received and carried in bond over the British lines, if intended for the Dominion provinces, and the American roads, whose hands were tied by the interstate-commerce law, could not compete. Now, I am not complaining of the interstate law; that is all right.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would simply say to the gentleman from New York that I think he would be doing a great thing for the railroad business of this country if he, as an ingenious business man, could devise some amendment to bring the Canadian Pacific Railroad under the provisions of the interstate-commerce law. I wish him to give his attention to that, not on this bill, but in a bill that will be here for consideration during this session.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. In other words, you desire to shut out our people from the competition of all other roads unless it be the Pennsylvania Railroad or the New York Central.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want the Canadian Pacific Railroad to be brought under the interstate-commerce law and give our trunk-lines a chance for the American business.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I am covered with confusion by the complimentary notice that my esteemed and able friend from Pennsylvania has made of me, and if I were on a committee in which I had influence I would try the experiment; but as a member of the minority in this House, understanding how the rules of the House are made, a party in the minority is not likely to do anything very effective by simply introducing a bill.

Now, I will resume the thread of my discourse. As to the question which has been raised by my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] in the interruption, in which he wants to protect the people in the Northwest from being shut out and deprived of their rights under the operation of the law which shall prevent free shipment through Canada, I wish to say that that American citizen needs to be born again, and if he is of foreign birth, as my respected and able friend is, he needs to be naturalized again in the principles of American government if he believes the great commercial rights and interests of the whole country should be dominated by the interests of any particular locality.

Instead of using the power of the American Government for his benefit and for the benefit of his district and his State, the commerce by Canadian railroads ought to be made amenable to the provisions of our own wise interstate-commerce law or be wholly interdicted.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. In other words, we ought to legislate for the benefit of Wall street.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I am not defending Wall street. It needs no defense at my hands. I am not attacking Minnesota. She is abundantly able to vindicate her honorable standing in the sisterhood of States. But all that she should require and all that she should ask is that the American Congress should never barter away the rights of the whole country for the sake of being given advantage through foreign competition of uncontrolled Canadian railroads. She should never ask for American money to be paid to foreign enterprises at the expense of the whole people. The Government of the United States in the management of its commerce under the interstate-commerce law should look to a fair and equitable adjustment of all the properties in this country, and see to it that while the gentleman from Minnesota and the constituents of the gentleman from Minnesota have the broadest right to use foreign railroads they should use them under the same restrictions which are wisely imposed upon American enterprises. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Is not the present position precisely as though we should relieve one American railroad from the operation of the interstate-commerce law and shackle all the rest?

Mr. WHITE, of New York. It is. The goods start out on an American railroad and end on an American railroad, and have been hauled across the country north of Lake Superior on a road that can discriminate between a long and a short haul. And it operates to the advantage of one and the disadvantage of all the rest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will state that there are fourteen minutes remaining to the side on the left of the Chair to make an equalization of the time consumed.

Mr. HITT. Inasmuch as no gentleman asks fourteen minutes to speak, and as I have stated that the gentlemen who were to speak on both sides would alternate, it was expected that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] would follow.

Mr. McCREARY. I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It would be a useless waste of the time of this House to go into an argument to show what every one in the country admits—that for some time the fishermen of the United States have been subjected to numerous petty annoyances and illegal harassment by Canada and Great Britain.

I shall therefore, in the few minutes for which I feel at liberty to ask the attention of the House, inquire only what is the duty of our Chief Magistrate and of the Government in the present condition of affairs, without going back to refer to the customs or statutes or treaties by which the United States and the British dominions regulated their intercourse up to the time of making the treaty of 1871.

The purview and operation of the earlier treaties, laws, and regulations, and the questions rising under them, have been thoroughly elucidated by the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the debates in the Senate and in this House on the fisheries question at this session; but they have little bearing on the question before us now.

In order to understand the present situation and our rights and duties it is necessary to refer to some of the provisions of the treaty of 1871. It primarily treated of the Alabama claims, but it also secured to the fishermen of the United States, in addition to their prior rights under the treaty of 1818, the right to fish in certain waters of British North America, and to the fishermen of British North America the right to fish in certain waters of the United States; and it provided that the fishery products of each country should be admitted into the other free of duty, and that the balance of advantages, if any, should be settled by a commission.

The commission fixed the balance of damages against the United States at $5,500,000, which was paid.

As the meaning and proper interpretation of certain articles of that treaty have been, and are in this House, considered open to question or doubt, I ask attention to the exact language of Articles XVIII, XIX, XXI, XXVI, XXVII, XXVIII, XXIX, XXX, and XXXIII, and I shall incorporate them in the RECORD with my remarks.

ARTICLE XVIII.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American Colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the seacoasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks, of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen, in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen.

ARTICLE XIX.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the eastern seacoasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and on the shores of the several islands thereunto adjacent, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the said seacoasts and shores of the United States and of the said islands, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts of the United States and of the islands aforesaid, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with the fishermen of the United States in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for fishermen of the United States.

ARTICLE XXI.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except fish of the inland lakes, and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the fisheries of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward's Island, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty.

ARTICLE XXVI.

The navigation of the river St. Lawrence, ascending and descending, from the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, where it ceases to form the boundary between the two countries, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

The navigation of the rivers Yukon, Porcupine, and Stikine, ascending and descending, from, to, and into the sea, shall forever remain free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty and to the citizens of the United States, subject to any laws and regulations of either country within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

ARTICLE XXVII.

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

ARTICLE XXVIII.

The navigation of Lake Michigan shall also, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, be free and open for the purposes of commerce to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, subject to any laws and regulations of the United States or of the States bordering thereon not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation.

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States or for export from ports in the said possessions.

ARTICLE XXX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States.

Citizens of the United States may for the like period carry in United States vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in North America, to another port or place within the said possessions: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the territory of the United States by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of the United States and the Government of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States further engages not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article through the territory of the United States; and Her Majesty's Government engages to urge the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the Legislatures of the other colonies not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article; and the Government of the United States may, in case such export duties are imposed by the Dominion of Canada, suspend, during the period that such duties are imposed, the right of carrying granted under this article in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals of the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII.

ARTICLE XXXIII.

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislature of Prince Edward's Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

In March, 1883, Congress passed a joint resolution providing for the termination of Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, and XXX of said treaty, and the termination took effect July 1, 1885. During the life of those articles there was little complaint by our fishermen; but on their annulment the Canadian authorities renewed their illegal and vexatious conduct, so that it became the duty of our Government to take notice of their doings, and in 1886, as we are informed by the President in his message, notice was received by our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond, free of duty, through Canadian territory to this country, and ever since that time such shipment has been denied.

To civilized or Christian statesmen the course to be pursued under such circumstances does not admit of the least doubt. I think that if we throw aside partisan prejudice and the desire to make partisan capital, there will be no doubt in the minds of anybody, and no one will fail to admit that there was but one plain duty for the President under the circumstances.

While every Government is bound to guard and protect the rights of the individual citizens at all hazards, yet that ruler or executive who would precipitate war without some imperative necessity therefor, and without having exhausted every reasonable and peaceable means to avoid it, would not only merit but surely draw down upon himself the execration of every humane and right-minded man. War is only to be contemplated as a cruel and dernier ressort. Every good man must hope for the coming of that day when we shall beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning-hooks, when nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

In this case President Cleveland was not forgetful either of his duty to our injured citizens or of the demands of humanity and civilization. Almost at the earliest possible moment—in December, 1885—in his annual message he called the attention of Congress to the situation, and recommended that provision should be made for a commission to adjust the differences and disputes which had arisen. In this and in the power which he now asks he has trodden not only in the path of duty, but in the very footsteps of illustrious predecessors in his high office. In 1870, when essentially the same state of affairs existed that exists to-day, President Grant, in his second annual message to Congress, used this language:

Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighborly acts upon our fishermen, I recommend to confer upon our Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of the laws authorizing the transport of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada; and further, should such extreme measures become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

Congress refused to comply with the request of President Cleveland to provide for a commission, but enacted this law of March 3, 1887, which I shall also incorporate into the record of my remarks:

An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfuly sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either of all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved March 3, 1887.

There are many objections to this act of 1887, to some of which I may refer particularly before taking my seat. But there are two that strike us at first blush.

Retaliation is incipient war. He is a braggart and a coward who will resort to it without intending to follow it, if necessary, to its probable or possible consequences. This act was for that reason ill-timed if it was intended that the President should enforce it before he had by treaty or other peaceable means sought redress. It was, too, as an act of retaliation inadequate, as it would have injured us nearly or quite as much as it would have injured our adversaries. Indeed, in some localities the putting of it into operation would have resulted in much greater injury to the citizens of the United States than to the citizens of Canada.

Now permit me to call attention to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHITE] who has just taken his seat. The gentleman insists that retaliation under the act here proposed, in pursuance of the message of the President, would inflict great and serious injury on us, and that therefore it should not be resorted to. I wish to remind the party opposed to the Administration in Congress that they have refused to permit the President to adjust our differences by negotiation. They complain that he has attempted that. He can not declare war, and he must either permit our citizens to continue to suffer the wrongs complained of or else resort to retaliation. The question, therefore, is presented between the act of 1887 and the act which we are now considering, as I shall hereafter show. I assert here, and I shall try to prove by a comparison of these two acts, that every injury which he alleges would result to our people by enforcing the act that is now before the House would have resulted to our people from the enforcement of the act of 1887, and many greater injuries.

Let me call attention now to the provisions of these two acts. By the act of 1887 it is provided, among other things, that "it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, etc., any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States." What further? Also "to deny entry into any port or place in the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said Dominion, or other goods coming from said Dominion to the United States." That is what the act of 1887 provides. Does the gentleman from New York pretend to believe that after we shall have denied the right to Canadians to transmit goods or merchandise from Canada to the United States, they will still permit the transmission of goods from the United States to Canada?

No man can believe that. I will presently show the House how the act of 1887 would operate upon the interests of the Northwest if it were enforced.

Mr. LIND. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIND. I understand the gentleman to say that it is not to be supposed that Canada will permit us to retaliate without paying us in our own coin. Now, if that is true, does my colleague suppose that Canada would permit us to retaliate as provided in the pending act, without also repaying us in our own coin?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I will come to that in a minute. I will show by reference to this act before the House that it does not assume to cut off the right of transmission of goods from Canada to the United States any more than it does the transmission of goods from the United States to Canada. There is entire mutuality under it. The question of my colleague could not arise under this act. I shall now turn back to the point in my argument at which I diverged to notice the position of the gentleman from New York.

The President, on the refusal of Congress to authorize a commission, attempted to do what I think his duty manifestly required of him—to obtain redress for our citizens and to adjust the differences between the two countries by a treaty negotiated under the treaty-making power conferred on the Executive by the Constitution. In pursuance of this power he appointed three commissioners, two Democrats and one Republican, to act with a like number appointed by the British Government, with a view to a speedy adjustment of the matters of difference. The commissioners met at Washington last November, and the treaty having been agreed upon, it was by the President at once submitted to the Senate. After prolonged discussion the Senate rejected it.

It perhaps was unfortunate that the Senate was required to act upon it in a year of a Presidential election. It is too true, as all experience shows, that public interests are at such times often made subservient to supposed party advantages.

It is sufficient to say, and perhaps as much as I could with propriety say, that without the proposing of a single amendment the treaty was disagreed to by a strict party vote, which has unfortunately produced a widespread impression that party considerations triumphed over patriotism. Pending negotiations, of course the President could not, without disregard of the plainest rules of propriety, have even suggested a resort to retaliation, or to any other mode of redress. No man can, therefore, with truthfulness, affirm that down to this time the President has been neglectful of his duty. A period having been put to negotiations, and the President having in mind his duty to guard the honor of the country and the rights of its citizens, he at once determined on retaliation, the only course left open this side of actual war, and he could only proceed, as I have above said, under the act of 1887, or apply to Congress for enlarged powers.

He realized that an attempt at retaliation is puerile if not effective, and that it is calculated to bring contempt on the Government resorting to it under such circumstances. He also realized that retaliation is worse than contemptible when it inflicts a greater injury on him who attempts it than on his adversary. As he has forcibly said in his recent message, "A policy of national retaliation manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest harm upon those who have injured us with the least possible damage to ourselves, and above all things, the plan of retaliation if entered upon should be thorough and vigorous."

It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of the treaty. But one thing is clear—if it was not adequate, it might have been made so by amendment; and no one, I think, can read the reports of the committee and the discussions on this question in the Senate without coming to the conclusion that the majority of that body determined that there should now be no treaty. And having been rejected its sufficiency to effect the object intended is not material here.

The question now is simply, what is the best mode of retaliation?

I very much regret that this question could not have been discussed in this House—if it was to be discussed at all—on its merits and without any disingenuous attempt to misrepresent the President or to put forth false issues for political effect. But it has not been.

While most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have declared that they favor this measure, many of them show by their acts and by their course in the discussion that they do not. They not only without reason insinuate, but declare that the President was actuated by unworthy motives in sending in his message, although he has done only what President Grant did when political considerations can not be supposed to have influenced him.

Some of them have declared that this act is a "humbug" and "unnecessary," and some have gone so far as to say that its enactment would be a breach of our treaty obligations; yet they all, with two or three exceptions, say they will vote for it. This would seem to show a low state of morals or a lack of manly independence, or both, unbecoming to men who assume to lecture the President on political morals, and who even venture to charge him with "pusillanimity."

They have attempted to divert attention from the merits of the measure by lugging into the discussion other matters not germane or relevant, and to excite the supposed prejudice of persons or classes by epithets not only calculated but intended to mislead and deceive. While the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] are among the most intelligent and fair-minded men on this floor, they have gone out of their way in this debate to charge that the President's message is a free-trade document, though they well know that the President is not a free-trader and that he has in his message in emphatic language declared against free trade.

They declare that the Mills bill is a free-trade bill, though they well know that there is perhaps not another nation on earth that has so high a tariff as that bill provides for.

They affirm that by this bill there is given to Canada without consideration many thousands of dollars annually; they intentionally seek to give the impression that this is done by the friends of this bill out of partiality for Canada over our own people, though they well know that the proposed reduction of tariff on the few articles imported from that country is to prevent the monopolists and millionaires of our own country from extorting from our people oppressive, unjust, and unnecessary taxes.

They well know that the President and the advocates of revenue reform and reduction of taxes are fighting the battles of the masses of our own people against a mushroom moneyed aristocracy that has been built up under our high-tariff laws until it has become an offense to genuine manhood and an excrescence upon republican institutions.

The fact that our highest offices are being contended for and filled by men whose only recommendation is that they are enormously wealthy by the operation of our unjust tariff laws, has become a reproach to our institutions.

Mr. Carnegie's income—the result of our tariff laws—is set down at $1,500,000 per year, which is $125,000 per month, $28,846 per week, $4,120.85 per day, $343.40 per hour, $5.72 per minute, and nearly 10 cents per second——

Mr. DALZELL. Where does the gentleman get his figures in reference to Mr. Carnegie?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I got it from the statement of an honored member of this House.

Mr. DALZELL. But did the gentleman read Mr. Carnegie's explanation?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, I did read the explanation of Mr. Carnegie, and it only made me satisfied the statement of the "honored member" of this House was true.

Mr. DALZELL. Who was the "honored member" of the House to whom the gentleman refers?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is irrelevant, and only calculated to distract the House from the pending question.

Mr. DALZELL. No. Now, does not the gentleman know that Mr. Carnegie has denied the statement which the "honored member" to whom he has referred as having made in this House? And does he not know that Judge KELLEY, a member of this House, corroborated Mr. Carnegie?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes; I know Mr. Carnegie made a statement in which he denied it, but I also know that his denial, as I saw it, was rather calculated to corroborate the statement.

Mr. DALZELL. That is the foundation, then, of your statement and of the figures you are now giving to the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, sir; and every appearance and indication justify it. Such is the man who is claiming that the high protective system shall be kept up to its present height or we will all go to destruction. It is said he began as secretary of J. Edgar Thomson, of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Mr. DALZELL. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Such men as this insist that any man who attempts to reduce that protective system which has given them their enormous wealth is a free-trader and an enemy of the people.

Mr. DALZELL. Since the gentleman appeals to me, I wish to say that Mr. Carnegie was never a private secretary of Mr. J. Edgar Thomson. He made his fortune before he went into the steel business. And the statement that he made a million and a half of dollars in a year is perfectly absurd and ridiculous, and particularly false. Yes, and false in addition. The man is credulous indeed who swallows any such thing. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The gentleman seems to know all about Mr. Carnegie's business; now will he tell us how much does he make per annum? He seems to speak for him; how much does he make?

Mr. DALZELL. I could not tell you.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then you do not know, though you deny the statement of an honorable member of this House who says Mr. Carnegie told him so.

Mr. DALZELL. No more than I know how much the gentleman makes, or how much is made by the "honored gentleman" who made the statement that Mr. Carnegie had boasted that he was worth $20,000,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The gentleman attempts to give me information of things which he knows nothing about.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman know how much the "honored member" to whom he refers makes out of his "pluck-me" stores? [Applause and laughter on Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The President and the supporters of the Mills bill say that this is unjust; and when they attempt a modification of the law that would effect a more equal distribution of the wealth of the country they are met with epithets and disingenuous appeals to prejudice by those who were only known as the champions of labor when an election was imminent.

These questions should not have been dragged into this discussion, and misrepresentation should not find a place in any discussion.

As I said, the question here is what is the best mode of effective retaliation for the wrongs inflicted on our people by Canada and England?

The President is justified in calling for such enlarged powers as to him seem needful or proper. He would be culpable if he did not do so, and it is our duty to confer such powers if necessary or proper. That they are necessary is not to be doubted unless the act of 1887 is just and adequate, and to attempt to prove that it is not would seem to be an unnecessary waste of the time of this House, for the fact that Canada and England look on it with such composure and even apparent satisfaction, and on the course suggested by the President with such disapproval and manifest alarm, is the plenary proof that that act would not be effective and this would.

In the Northwest, where I am best acquainted, the enforcement of the act of 1887 would work very great injury to our own people and comparatively little to Canada. I am led to believe that that is one reason why the President desires the passage of this act so that it might not be necessary for him to enforce that. By that act it was provided that "It shall be the duty of the President, in his discretion, by proclamation, * * * to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States." This would shut off all trade or intercourse between the two countries. The trade between Manitoba and Minnesota is very great. There are hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat produced in Manitoba brought into the United States annually and there milled and the manufactured product shipped to the East and to Europe. This would all be prevented by the act of 1887, for that act would prevent the importation of that wheat from Manitoba into Minnesota.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I have but a very few moments' time remaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. I only want to ask if it is true that this bill repeals the act of 1887?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. No; I said that it authorized the President to resort to this instead of the other.

Mr. HAUGEN. Or both.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, or both; but the gentleman must bear in mind that if the President had exercised the power conferred upon him by the act of 1887, which gentlemen on the other side find fault with him for not exercising, it would have been very hurtful to our interests in the Northwest.

Mr. HAUGEN. How so? Was it not his duty under that act to avail himself of its provisions, or any of its provisions?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Perhaps so, though the act is very imperative in its terms. Perhaps the President might have refused to exercise all or any of the powers conferred by it, but the course of the opposition shows that he would have been censured for so doing, and it must be admitted that if he had exercised the powers conferred, and which it was evidently intended he should exercise, our interests must have suffered.

Mr. DAVIS. But does not the gentleman admit that he would have had discretion?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Well, I suppose so. But I must beg to be permitted to proceed without interruption, as my time is limited.

Mr. DAVIS. Pardon me; I only wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the President had the power to discriminate under the act to which he refers.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I should be very glad to pursue this question further in answer to my friend from Massachusetts, but my time is limited, and I shall have to proceed in the course I have mapped out for myself.

This is but one illustration of the unjust and prejudicial effect of the act of 1887 on the Northwest.

It would be a direct blow at some of our transportation lines which cheapen the carriage of our products to the East, for on some of those lines products or goods shipped from the West to the East necessarily pass into Canada and from Canada to the United States and therefore would be inhibited by this act. This would be a severe and unjust blow to the Northwest. It would be compelling it to pay the consideration for the settlement of the fisheries question, which principally interests New England.

I am aware that this is a national question and should not be treated or looked at from a narrow, sectional standpoint. But if the people of either section are to be affected injuriously by retaliation it should rather be those of that section that is to receive the benefit.

And the object that gentlemen on the other side have in view—and that is the Wall street object; the capitalist's view of the question—is to compel the great Northwest to bear the large share of the burden of the settlement of this fisheries question, and that is just what the gentleman from New York, who took his seat but a few minutes ago, and other gentlemen who have argued this question upon the other side and who represent Eastern railroads, favor in the interest of their constituencies. They prefer that character of retaliation which will inflict injury and cost upon the people of the great Northwest to settle a difficulty which affects their local constituencies; just as my friend from Pennsylvania here is always very eager to do what he can for the interest of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania—the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to benefit American capital as against British capital and American railroads as against foreign railroads.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. And I, Mr. Speaker, wish to encourage and benefit those lines of road that furnish us competition and cheap transportation. There is no danger but that American capital and American railroads will take care of themselves. Situate so far as we are from the seaboard, cheap transportation is absolutely essential to our prosperity. And any act that would interfere with that would strike us in a vital point.

As I said, the President saw this; and by his recommendation has sought to avoid it, and the bill introduced pursuant to his suggestion does avoid it.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. It takes away the freights from the laboring men.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, it perhaps might take away some freights in your city of New York, of course; and the act of 1887 would have done that and much more, too, as I think I have shown. In other words, the act of 1887 is the Wall-street act to make the people of the great Northwest foot a large share of the consideration for the settlement of the fisheries question.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I dislike very much to say no to a courteous request.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Well, that is a courteous reply, and I will be very brief in my inquiry.

Does the gentleman contend that the act of 1887 must be put in force in all of its parts, and that discrimination can not be made by the President simply to stop the Dominion shipping from coming into our ports?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I admit, as I have before said, that perhaps the President might not be required to execute all parts of the act of 1887, nor would he be required to execute all parts of this act. But, as I have said, this act should pass for this as well as other reasons. No evil consequence can possibly follow from the execution of this that would not necessarily follow from the execution of that; and if the act of 1887 were executed according to its purview great injury would come to our section of the country which could not follow from the execution of this act.

I here ask attention to this bill. By its first section—which is the only section bearing on this question—it is provided simply and only that on the happening of certain things the President, by his proclamation, may forbid the transportation across the territory of the United States in bond without the payment of duty of any goods, wares, or merchandise, exported or imported, from any foreign country to Canada or from Canada to any foreign country. It does not interfere with the transportation of any goods from Canada to or through any part of the United States, or from the United States to or through any part of Canada. The language of the statute is—

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States in bond and without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country from or to the British dominions in North America.

SEC. 2. That whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River Canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is, or may be, detrimental to the interests of the United States, or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, to issue a proclamation to that effect, whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal; and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act, or the President may, in his discretion, when he is satisfied there is any such discrimination, prohibit the use of said canals to any such foreign vessel. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect, in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected, and said prohibition, if ordered, shall cease.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

It will be seen that the trade of the Northwest could not be affected by this.

I do not feel at liberty to dwell longer on the meaning of this section. It is free from ambiguity.

Against this act it is argued:

1. That Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is now in force, and therefore that we are under a moral obligation at least not to disregard or attempt to annul it under two years after a notice of our wish to terminate shall have been given; and

2. That if it is not in force then no statute is required to authorize the President to suspend the transportation of goods in bond, etc., across our territory.

I think this contention is more specious than sound. By section 18 of the treaty it will be observed that there is granted to the inhabitants of the United States by her Britannic Majesty certain privileges "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII;" and by section 19 like privileges are granted to the British subjects by the United States "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII." In Article XXIX of the treaty the right to transport goods in bond is granted "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII."

The language of Article XXXIII is given above.

I am of the opinion that by a strict and proper construction of the language of Article XXIX, its life terminated when the life of Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX terminated. Indeed, I do not think it admits of any other construction.

The term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII, which is the term of the life of this article, is not for ten years or twelve years, or any other given or certain number of years, but for a term beginning with the approval of the law to carry Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX into effect, and ending two years after the giving of notice of the wish to terminate said articles; that is, to terminate Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX. If I am right in this position, then of course Article XXIX terminated with the fisheries articles. This position is justified, as pointed out by the President, by the language of the law of 1873, which was enacted to carry Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX into effect, and by the official memoranda of the High Joint Commissioners who negotiated the treaty. The language of the act of 1873 is as follows:

That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall remain in force according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry, etc.

The meaning and intention of this act in this respect can not be misunderstood.

The official memoranda of the High Joint Commissioners who negotiated the treaty show with equal clearness that they so understood the meaning of the language of that article. Those memoranda are in the following words:

The transit question was discussed and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fisheries articles should be in force.

This is, at least, a contemporaneous construction of Article XXIX, which is nearly or quite conclusive of its meaning. Nor is there anything in the joint resolution of March 3, 1883, providing for the termination of Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, at all inconsistent with this view. And as the language of the act of March 1, 1873, putting this treaty into effect, clearly limits the life of Article XXIX of the treaty to the life of Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and of Article XXX, whether this act was or was not in accordance with the intention of the treaty, it limited and controlled it, for it is a rule of law so clear on principle and so well settled by authorities that a statute inconsistent with an earlier treaty controls, modifies, or repeals the treaty, it would be a mere affectation of learning to cite authorities in its support. In any view that may be taken on this subject, therefore, I am satisfied that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is not in force.

But it by no means follows from that that the bill now under consideration is unnecessary. The practice of transporting in bond without payment of duty was in force under different statutes before the treaty, and perhaps before any statute authorizing it. These statutes still remain and that practice which has by unquestioned usage been sanctioned still remains. And it is not only proper but necessary that a statute should be passed which would authorize the President in his discretion to discontinue that practice and suspend the operation of those statutes.

The gentleman from New Jersey argues that section 29 did not fall with the fisheries articles, but that by the refusal of the Canadian Government to permit the transportation of fish in bond across its territory in 1886 the President had a right to declare section 29 abrogated, and that the President's acts have been pusillanimous, etc., for not so doing.

This merely shows the straits to which the opposition are driven to find a pretext for censuring the President.

A reference to the proceedings of the Halifax Commission shows that the counsel for the United States—

Asked the commissioners to rule and declare that it is not competent for this commission to award any compensation for commercial intercourse between the two countries, and that the advantages resulting * * * from being allowed to transship cargoes in British waters do not constitute a foundation for award of compensation, and shall be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal.

After argument and consideration this motion was granted by the unanimous vote of the commissioners. The commission held and decided at the instance of the counsel of the United States that this was not one of the rights secured to the United States by the treaty of 1871. The discussion and decision of this question will be found on pages 7, 8, and 40, volume 1, Proceedings Halifax Commission, and volume 2, ibid., pages 1539–1588.

Mr. LIND. I will ask my colleague if that was not one of the elements of damage for which our country was compelled to pay $5,000,000 under the treaty of 1871?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It was not; on the contrary, the counsel of the United States made the point that it was not one of the elements of damage submitted to the commission, and asked that all evidence touching that be stricken out; and it was stricken out because it was not one of the grounds of damage, as the authorities above referred to show.

Mr. LIND. But our State Department has so recorded, and I will cite my colleague to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not think it has.

Time will not permit me, nor do I deem it necessary, to refer to section 2 of this bill. I believe its propriety and necessity are unquestioned. That we should permit Canada, in violation of her treaty obligations and common fairness, by discriminating tolls and unfair rebates to divert business from our country is not for a moment to be tolerated.

We having therefore the right to enact this statute and it being necessary to confer on the President the power asked in order to make retaliation effective, the other question arises for our consideration, shall he be allowed to exercise that power? I think he should.

I believe that nearly every intelligent man in the length and breadth of the land has come to believe that the President is a sagacious, able, honest, and courageous man, to whom the interests and rights of the people and the honor of the nation can safely be trusted.

Even his most earnest political opponents are constrained to admit this. Senator FRYE, of Maine, in speaking of the President when discussing this very question in January, 1887, used this language:

> The President of the United States, I believe, is an American citizen who has at heart the honor and the dignity of the great Republic over which he presides. He is an American citizen who, I believe, sympathizes with every other American citizen. He is an American citizen who believes in protecting the rights of American citizens everywhere; ay, more, I believe that he is an honest man, and if you place the power contained in this bill in his hands he will use it for the protection of our rights or maintenance of our honor, and that we, as Congress, have no right to-day to doubt or hesitate over the question whether or not he will properly use the power. To us there is a plain, clear, unmistakable duty, and that is to give the chief executive officer of the Republic power enough to protect our honor and the rights of our citizens.

Except where it is deemed admissible to pervert the truth for political purposes this is the voice of intelligent people everywhere.

Mr. LIND. When was it said? I did not notice the date on which it was said.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That was said a year ago.

Mr. LIND. Before the negotiation of the fisheries treaty?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I understand my colleague to imply that because and since the President attempted to settle our difficulties with another nation by amicable and usual means he has ceased to deserve the confidence of the people and Congress which otherwise would properly have been imposed in him. I think it truly unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that we have arrived at such a pass.

That the power proposed to be conferred by this act would be efficacious is, I believe, generally conceded. The great complaint that seems to be made in Canada and Great Britain, and by certain parties in this country who, for reasons best understood by themselves, seem to be shocked by the President's recommendation, is that the exercise of the power would be unnecessarily severe. That it would inflict very serious inconvenience on Canada with the least possible injury to us is, I think, quite certain. And I think it equally certain that it would bring Canada to a realization of the fact that though the United States are long-suffering and slow to wrath they will not permit the rights of a single citizen to be trampled on with impunity.

I trust, therefore, that this bill will become a law.

If the public journals are to be credited, it is given out that if we attempt a vigorous enforcement of our rights we may hear the voice of protest from the throats of cannon on the gunboats of Great Britain.

Sir, President Cleveland is not the man nor are the people of the United States the people to be deterred from insistence on their rights by any such menace.

Should war be declared, which God forbid, a gunboat of Great Britain would scarcely have time to reach our shores before Canada would be a part of the territory of the United States, with the Stars and Stripes floating from the Heights of Abraham. Ay, Mr. Speaker, should war be declared recollections of the past would be awakened by the patriotic and friendly emulation of the sons of Massachusetts and the sons of South Carolina to be foremost in resisting the aggressions and punishing the insolence of Great Britain. And when the sons of the North and the sons of the South shall have again baptized the old flag in their commingled friendly blood, the British Dominions in North America and sectionalism among ourselves will forever afterward be things of the past.

No, Mr. Speaker, I think there will not be war. It is only when Great Britain contends with an unequal adversary that she is overbearing and warlike. When she confronts her equal in strength she is yielding and submissive. But should the Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India, forgetting the lessons taught her ancestors in the past, aim or discharge at us one unfriendly gun I predict that the echo which it would awaken would not cease to reverberate before Grover Cleveland, President of the greatest Republic on earth, would salute Charles Stewart Parnell as President of the youngest Republic on earth.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Will my friend permit me? He was so urbane that I would not interrupt him during his speech, but I wish to ask if I understood him to say that the act of 1887 was a Wall-street measure, and as that act was passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, which had a Democratic majority of 43, is there an imputation that the Democratic Congress was bought or materially influenced by Wall street?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I did not mean to say that the act of 1887 was a Wall-street measure. I was not in the Forty-ninth Congress, but I will tell you what I do understand, and that is that it was a measure that originated in the Senate and was insisted on by the Senate and pressed on the House by the Senate; and you know better than I the influence that Wall street has on the Senate or the Senate on Wall street. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND].

Mr. LIND. Mr. Speaker, as the sentiment of the House appears to be almost unanimous in favor of the passage of the bill now under consideration, I feel it my duty to state the reasons that impel me to vote against it. The President says:

> I recommend immediate legislative action conferring upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of all laws and regulations permitting the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across or over the territory of the United States to or from Canada.

And the bill before us is skillfully drawn to carry this recommendation into effect.

What does this request mean? It means to the people of Minnesota and Dakota alone that in his discretion he can, by the stroke of a pen, reduce the value of our 60,000,000 bushels of wheat that will seek the markets of the East and the seaboard this Fall by at least 7 cents a bushel. It means that by exercising the powers he asks he can enhance exactions of Northwestern railroads at least 25 per cent. It means that he can rob Duluth of nearly half her shipping. It means that he can ruin the trade of the "twin cities," the pride of our State and of the Northwest. It means that he can cripple the energetic and enterprising men of our State, who have invested their means in the new lines of railway which place us practically as near the seaboard as the State of Illinois. These, sir, I should consider sufficient reasons for a vote in the negative, but I do not rest my objections to the bill on what you might call local grounds.

I shall vote against this bill because I believe it was conceived for an improper purpose. It is uncalled for, wrong in its spirit, and an unworthy exponent of the power, dignity, and honor of the American people.

What grounds does the President assign for asking these extraordinary powers? We have a right to scrutinize them.

He charges that the Canadian Government has discriminated against our citizens in the use of the Canadian canals, but we have not been advised to what extent or in what manner. Neither does he nor has any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs given us to understand that our Government has ever called the attention of the Canadian Government to this grievance or requested it to desist. If such request or demand had been made it would certainly have been complied with. Since the negotiation of the treaty of 1871 the United States has constructed and is now operating the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, wholly within our own territory.

It is the key, the sole entrance to the immense traffic of Lake Superior. Nearly ten thousand passages were made last season, and while I have not the official figures as to the proportion of Canadian vessels and steamers, I know it was very large. Every Canadian vessel passes through this canal without authority of law, except the provisions of Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 and the legislation in pursuance of it. The rights granted by this article are reciprocal, and as was well stated by my colleague [Mr. NELSON] yesterday, the President has the power to suspend this right if Canada refuses our citizens the canal rights to which they are entitled. This right has already been conferred by the act of March 3, 1887. Under these circumstances, does it stand to reason that the Canadian Government would have refused to modify its canal regulations had the request been made?

As to the refusal to ship or permit the shipment of fish in bond, it must be admitted that if the President is right in his assumption that the twenty-ninth article died with the fisheries articles, then Canada has violated no agreement in refusing it; but I think differently, and for that reason will discuss that question in connection with the grievances of our fishermen.

The gist of our differences with Canada is her denial of the full and free exercise of our fishery rights and the damage inflicted on our fishermen in person and property.

Is this the grievance we want to redress, or is the President after something else?

From his utterances one is forced to the conclusion that he wants retaliatory powers, not to secure observance of our rights, not to redress our grievances, but for the sake of retaliation as such. This is why I shall vote no on this bill.

If we have cause for retaliation, let us retaliate in a manner sanctioned by the law of nations, and not to the prejudice of our national honor or to the inestimable damage of our own people.

If we have matters to negotiate, let us not embarrass or block the way for negotiations beforehand.

If we have cause for war, then let our quarrel remain just and our action such, that it has the approval of our own conscience and of the judgment of mankind.

What is retaliation as sanctioned by the law of nations?

Vattel says (Book 11, chapter 18, section 339):

When a nation can not obtain justice, whether for a wrong or an injury, she has a right to do herself justice. But before she declares war there are various methods practiced among nations. Among those methods of obtaining satisfaction has been reckoned what is called the law of retaliation, according to which we make another suffer precisely as much evil as he has done.

He then refers to his views on the measure of punishments as follows:

From the foundation even of the right of punishing and from the lawful end of inflicting penalties arises the necessity of keeping them within just bounds. Since they are designed to procure the safety of the state and of the citizens, they ought never to extend beyond what that safety requires.

And continues:

Let us say, then, that a nation may punish another if the latter refuses to give her a just satisfaction; but she has not a right to extend the penalty beyond what her own safety requires. Retaliation—

He says, in italics—which is unjust between private persons would be much more so between nations, because it would in the latter case be difficult to make the punishment fall on those who had done the injury. When a sovereign is not satisfied with the manner in which his subjects are treated by the laws and customs of another nation, he is at liberty to declare that he will treat the subjects of that nation in the same manner as his are treated. This is what is called retortion.

Woolsey, in his work on International Law, § 114, section 2, says:

Retortion, or retaliation, is to apply the lex talionis to another nation—treating it or its subjects in similar circumstances, according to the rule which it has set. Thus if a nation has failed in comity or politeness, if it has embarrassed intercourse by new taxes on commerce or the like, the same or an analogous course may be taken by the aggrieved power to bring it back to propriety and duty. The sphere of retortion ought to be confined within the imperfect rights or moral claims of an opposite party. Rights ought not to be violated because another nation has violated them.

I might cite a dozen more authors to the like effect. They all agree that retaliation should not exceed reasonable satisfaction; that it should be "in kind;" that it should violate no rights; in other words, that the "punishment should fit the crime."

For the grievances we have suffered at the hands of Canada a remedy has been suggested. This remedy was suggested by those who are best able to judge of its efficacy and who are most interested—the fishermen themselves. In June, 1887, the president of the American Fishery Union wrote to Mr. Cleveland, and in behalf of the fishermen of the United States requested the President to exclude British American fishing-products from the markets of the United States until such time as Canada should concede American fishermen rights. The President had the power to comply with it under the act of March 3, 1887. The request was reasonable. A proclamation in compliance with it would have met the approval of the entire people. It was in harmony with the law and usages of other nations. It would have satisfied our fishermen and secured speedy redress for their injuries. What did the President do? He wrote a letter (page 91, Miscellaneous Document No. 109, Fiftieth Congress). I quote from it:

I understand the main purpose of your letter is to suggest that, in case recourse to the retaliatory measures authorized by this act should be invited by unjust treatment of our fishermen in the future, the object of such retaliation might be fully accomplished by "prohibiting Canadian-caught fish from entry into the ports of the United States."

The existing controversy is one in which two nations are the parties concerned. The retaliation contemplated by the act of Congress is to be enforced, not to protect solely any particular interest, however meritorious or valuable, but to maintain the national honor——

This is a remarkable scheme for the defense of our honor, and had he not reiterated the same views in the last message I should not have quoted it out of respect for his high office. But in the document we are now considering he says:

Plainly stated, the policy of national retaliation manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest harm upon those who have injured us, with the least possible damage to ourselves.

After considering these views it is refreshing to turn to the message of a former President, who had a higher conception of American honor. In the treaty of July 4, 1831, with France, that nation admitted an indebtedness of 25,000,000 francs to us, payable in six annual installments. When the first installment fell due she refused to pay, without cause. The money was demanded with firmness, and President Jackson thus advised Congress, in his sixth annual message (1834), as to the policy of such action:

Our institutions are essentially pacific. Peace and friendly intercourse with all nations are as much the desire of our Government as they are the interest of our people. But these objects are not to be permanently secured by surrendering the rights of our citizens or permitting solemn treaties for their indemnity in cases of flagrant wrong to be abrogated or set aside.

It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress seriously to affect the agricultural and manufacturing interests of France by the passage of laws relating to her trade with the United States. Her products, manufactures, and tonnage may be subjected to heavy duties in our ports, or all commercial intercourse with her may be suspended. But there are powerful and, to my mind, conclusive objections to this mode of proceeding. We can not embarrass or cut off the trade of France without at the same time, in some degree, embarrassing or cutting off our own trade.

The injury of such a warfare must fall, though unequally, upon our own citizens, and could not but impair the means of the Government, and weaken that united sentiment in support of the rights and honor of the nation which must now pervade every bosom; besides, by every measure adopted by the Government of the United States with the view of injuring France, the clear perception of right which will induce our own people and the rulers and people of all other nations, even of France herself, to pronounce our quarrel just will be obscured, and the support rendered to us in a final resort to more decisive measures will be more limited and equivocal.

President Jackson objected to retaliation that "must fall, though unequally, on our own citizens and weaken that united sentiment in support of the rights and honor of the nation which must pervade every bosom." How different is the spectacle presented by this Administration! The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], who is the avowed mouthpiece and spokesman of President Cleveland, stated in his speech on Friday last, as I understood him, that under this bill, if it became a law, the President would be enabled to suspend the transit of Canadian imports from the New England seaports and thus cut off a traffic amounting to from thirty to fifty millions a year. This would take the business and its profits from capital and the employment from labor, and the people thus injured would turn on the fishermen and curse them for the evils that had befallen them, and the whole fishery question would be confined to New England and made a local question.

What a patriotic purpose! Instead of uniting the people in sentiment he would array State against State, town against town, and brother against brother. He then cited the statement of a Treasury official to show that only 25 per cent. of the fishermen were native-born, and said that "the Yankee fisherman was now pegging shoes;" that 75 per cent. of the fishermen were Canadians, Scandinavians, and other foreigners. The only object of this must have been to convey the impression that foreign-born citizens were not entitled to protection against Canadian violence and insult.

From the views I have already expressed it will be apparent that the existence or non-existence of Article XXIX, at the present time, is immaterial, except in one aspect of the case. Our right to retaliate in the manner indicated by the President depends entirely on the correctness of his assumption that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 has been abrogated. He says it has. Against his views we have the official opinion of Secretary Bayard given in reply to a letter from Senator REAGAN. The letter is on file in the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, and reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 7, 1887.

SIR: I had the honor to receive late yesterday afternoon your telegram asking to be informed "when was the treaty of Washington between the United States and the Dominion of Canada abrogated? When did its provisions cease to operate?"

The information you desire is found in the accompanying document, containing the correspondence which took place between this Department and the British minister in 1885, and the President's proclamation in regard to the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington.

This document is reprinted in full in the recently printed Executive Document in relation to the rights of American fishermen in British North American waters (Executive Document No. 19, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pages 199-210), a copy of which is also inclosed herewith.

The treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain did not relate solely to the Canadian fisheries. Only the fishery articles thereof were abrogated, as enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 31, 1885. The remaining articles, comprising those which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, are still in force.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN,
U. S. Senate.

In this letter Mr. Bayard distinctly states that the articles of the treaty "which relate to commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions are still in force."

Congress has acted on this information. Senators MORGAN, SAULSBURY, BROWN, and PAYNE, all leading Democrats and able lawyers, say in their report on the proposed fisheries treaty as follows:

Article XXIX was not terminated, but it never had the least reference to the fisheries treaty of 1818, to enlarge its scope, change its meaning, or in any way to affect any right to which that treaty related. Yet, if that is not the true meaning of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, this present treaty in no way affects that article, and it stands for all that it was ever worth in favor of our fishermen.

The Republican Senators held the same view. With this array of authority against him I feel justified in assuming that the President is in error and that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 is still in force. If it is we have no right to pass the bill under consideration. But whether it is or not it is involved in sufficient doubt, so that if we should pass this act and the President should act under it such action would afford the British Government a very plausible claim for damages to offset against our just claims, and thus further embarrass any future negotiations for a settlement.

My colleague has labored long and hard to convince us that the President is right, and that the reciprocity article is abrogated. But what reason have we to believe that England will accept his reasoning when leading lawyers of his own political faith in the Senate and also on this side in the House deny it?

If England should accept the views of the Secretary of State and of the prominent Senators whom I have cited, supported by the unanimous opinion of the Republicans in the House and Senate, instead of the opinion of the President and my colleague, Mr. WILSON, then the passage of this bill and action under it would, as I have already suggested, afford England a claim, an offset against us. Will she not avail herself of this?

Why not leave the issue, then, clear cut and unembarrassed by other questions, as it stands at this time?

If, on the other hand, the President is right and Article XXIX has ceased to exist, then the President has the power he asks already, and the passage of the Wilson bill is not only unnecessary but improper.

It will be remembered that prior to the reciprocity treaty of 1871 there were only two statutory provisions for transportation in transit. They were carried into the Revised Statutes as sections 3005 and 3006, and read as follows:

SEC. 3005. All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed in transit, through the territory of the United States, without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

Section 3006 permits goods destined for interior American ports to pass through a foreign country, and the other, section 3005, permits goods destined for the British or Mexican provinces to be entered without payment of duty in the ports of the United States and to be carried over United States territory into the respective countries of their destination. The act of Congress on which these sections are based was simply permissive. They were not based upon anything received in return from the foreign countries or provinces.

They were mere courtesies granted, and aptly expressed in the permissive "may." This was unsatisfactory to the growing demands of our American commerce, and later, in the negotiation of the treaty of 1871, it was not only agreed that these courtesies should be continued, but the whole subject was gone over, renewed, revised, and enacted into an article of the treaty (No. XXIX) upon an entirely different basis. The United States were still willing to concede and did concede these privileges, and additional ones, but they demanded something in return. They demanded equal reciprocity and equal rights of transit, and an equal right for the admission of their goods at Canadian ports.

Now, there is no principle of law better established or better known to lawyers than the one which lays down the proposition that when a matter which has been the subject of legislation, or which has been a rule of the common law, is gone over by a subsequent legislature and wholly revised, the revision embracing all the old provisions and adding new matter to it, the old falls by implication. Is not that correct? Is there a lawyer here who disputes it? There is not and there can not be; because it is almost a self-evident proposition. Now, then, not only was this revised, but it was revised upon a different theory.

What had been simply a permission given on the part of the United States without anything in return to compensate for it, became by the revision a matter of right based upon reciprocal obligations imposed upon Canada. Not only was the object enlarged, not only was the same thing covered, but, as I have already stated, the whole matter was placed upon a different theory, upon a different obligation, and the old prior-existing permission was wiped out—merged, and is not now in force. The law, and all the statute law there is on the subject, is now embraced in the act of Congress of March 1, 1873 (in appendix).

I say, therefore, that if the President is right, and the twenty-ninth article is abrogated, then this act has fallen with it—Canada has no right of transit, and the power he asks is his already. It is his duty to execute the law, and nothing but the law, and if there is no law for the transit of Canadian goods over our territory he can stop it. You may say if that is true, why do you object to passing this bill? I object for this reason, that I do not think it is the duty of the American Congress to give the President an advisory verdict to do that which neither the law of nations nor patriotism dictates, nor the necessities of the case demand. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have trespassed long upon the time of the House, but there is one more feature involved in the proposed bill that I want to call attention to. I have referred to the sentiment expressed by the exponent of the doctrines and views of the Administration upon this floor. Now, gentlemen, do you not think there is some other purpose, some other object, than that which appears upon the face of these measures? Have there been any recent Canadian outrages to call for this haste?

The gentleman to whom I refer [Mr. SCOTT] admits that he is interested in the Canadian Pacific and a director of that railroad. I find no fault with that per se. It is a right which he has as an American citizen. We have Canadians interested in our railroads. But when, as a member of our national council, he comes here to advocate schemes to the detriment of our own people and for the purpose of furthering his own personal private interests as a stockholder and as an officer in a foreign corporation in a foreign country, then I say it is time to cry a halt. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If every power conferred upon the President by the act of March 3, 1887, should be executed, it would not prevent the millers of Minneapolis from exporting their flour and letting the Canadian Pacific take it at Sault Ste. Marie. You can not stop us from exporting our flour to Canada——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks. He is the only member of this House who is opposed to this bill, and by all the rules of debate he is entitled to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman took the floor for thirty minutes, the time yielded to him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who controls the time on that side.

Mr. LIND. I would like ten or fifteen minutes more. I was stopped in the middle of a sentence and I would like to complete it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time on that side is controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. LIND. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

Mr. HITT. I have been compelled to promise time to other gentlemen.

Mr. LIND. I want about ten minutes more to finish my sentence. [Laughter.]

Mr. SENEY. I move that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] have ten minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time can not be extended by a motion. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order. We have been debating this matter for three or four days here, and it is time we brought it to an end.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted I was making the statement that we could not prohibit Minnesota millers from exporting their product to Canada, to England, or to any other part of the world. Now, while a portion of our Minnesota flour goes to Glasgow and other British ports, the great bulk of it is eaten in Yankeedom, in New York, and some of it even down here. The point to which we primarily want to send it is the East and New England, and we send it to old England only as a dernier ressort.

Our productions are shipped by the "Soo" line of railroad from Minnesota to Sault Ste. Marie, and there the Canadian Pacific receives them and forwards across the Canadian peninsula to Ottawa, to Montreal, or to any of the Canadian points to the north of New England, and transfers them to the Canada and Atlantic, the Vermont Central, or the Grank Trunk, and by one or the other of these roads they are carried down into New England and distributed there or exported from New England ports. These New England connections are exactly what is proposed to be cut off by this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is what the act of 1887 does.

Mr. LIND. The act of March, 1887, did not touch that. It did not apply to goods imported into Canada through New England over these roads.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It did, but this bill does not.

Mr. LIND. The gentleman is certainly mistaken. Your bill is the best answer and I will print it in the appendix. Now, Mr. Speaker, this act proposes, and the President, for purposes stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, proposes to cut off this traffic between New England and Canada, which, according to the statistics cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] himself, amounted to $33,000,000 a year, and according to the statistics given in the President's message amounts to nearly fifty millions.

He proposes to cut that off—to prevent an American road—a New England road (it is only New England they are after)—from carrying a pound of goods from the Atlantic seaboard to Canada. Now, if that carrying trade is cut off, does it stand to reason that the roads will be able to carry our flour and produce to the seaboard and run empty the other way? Does it stand to reason that if we deprive Canada of that right—and it is a benefit to ourselves, for we are amply paid for the transportation—that they will stand silent and not retaliate? By no means.

Then what is the result? The result is that the Canadian Pacific road, receiving our flour and productions at Sault Ste. Marie, instead of being permitted to transfer them to the New England roads named to be distributed among our own people, must carry them over its own line to Halifax or St. John on the seaboard; and the objects of SCOTT and of the Canadian Pacific monopoly and of the Tory administration are accomplished. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This is not all. We will be prohibited from sending a barrel of flour to our own markets except by the lakes in summer or by taking the circuitous route by way of Chicago, hundreds of miles farther, and we will be completely in the hands of the Canadian Pacific monopoly on the north and the Chicago roads and American trunk-lines on the south for our railroad transportation. I will not say that my colleague [Mr. WILSON] wishes such a state of affairs, or that he so intended by his bill, but such will be its effect if enforced.

Mr. OATES rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LIND. I do not; my time is limited.

In conclusion I will say only one thing more. The President calls attention to the fact that American roads have carried goods and merchandise for Canada to the value of $270,000,000 in the last six years. Is this a fact to be regretted or deprecated? Is it not rather a source of pride? Have these goods been carried for nothing, or has their transportation furnished profitable returns to American capital and labor? Is it not fair to assume that the Canadians paid all the service was worth?

It is true, Mr. Speaker, as the President suggests, that when the St. Lawrence is "closed by ice," when Canada lies enwrapped in the shroud of arctic winter, when her harbors are blockaded by the same power, the President could, by exercising the powers he asks, by shutting off the supply of food and clothing for her people, inflict a serious and terrible punishment. Would we be proud of the act? Would it be becoming the honor and liberality of the greatest and most powerful nation of the civilized world? Will you grant to the President powers which, if he should exercise them in the spirit he indicates, would bring the blush of shame on every cheek?

But, sir, I plead not for Canada, nor for England—I hate England, or rather I hate and despise her policy of dealing with other nations and peoples weaker than herself. Her sense of right is measured by her power to defy it; her love of justice by the gold it will fetch. She enforces vice to replenish her exchequer. She enslaves and impoverishes every land and people that is caught in her toils—but I plead for our own honor. We can not afford to pass laws that will deliver our own people into the hands of monopoly and at the same time place us in the attitude of a "bully" before the world.

If we have grievances, let us demand their redress in a spirit and manner becoming our dignity. If such demands are unheeded, let us enforce our rights in the spirit of American patriotism and valor. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX.

[Extract from the treaty of 1871.]

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit without the payment of duties through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue, as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

ARTICLE XXX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States.

Citizens of the United States may for the like period carry in United States vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in North America, to another port or place within the said possessions: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the territory of the United States by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of the United States and the Government of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States further engages not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article through the territory of the United States; and Her Majesty's Government engages to urge the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the legislatures of the other colonies not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article; and the Government of the United States may, in case such export duties are imposed by the Dominion of Canada, suspend, during the period that such duties are imposed, the right of carrying granted under this article in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals of the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII.

ACT OF CONGRESS TO CARRY IT INTO EFFECT.

An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada, and the legislature of Prince Edward Island have passed laws on their part to give full effect to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed at the city of Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, as contained in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, he is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that he has such evidence, and thereupon, from the date of such proclamation, and so long as the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except fish or the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada or of Prince Edward Island, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty.

SEC. 2. That whenever the colony of Newfoundland shall give its consent to the application of the stipulations and provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV of said treaty, inclusive, to that colony, and the legislature thereof, and the Imperial Parliament shall pass the necessary laws for that purpose, the above-enumerated articles, being the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, from and after the date of a proclamation by the President of the United States, declaring that he has satisfactory evidence that the said colony of Newfoundland has consented, in a due and proper manner, to have the provisions of the said Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, of the said treaty extended to it, and to allow the United States the full benefits of all the stipulations therein contained, and shall be so admitted free of duty, so long as the said articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty.

SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been, or may from time to time be, specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions, through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States.

SEC. 4. That from the date of the President's proclamation, authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States, upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same to another port or place within the territory of the United States, as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States: And provided further, That the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty: And provided further, That in case any export or other duty continues to be levied after the 16th day of June, 1872, on lumber or timber of any kind cut on that portion of the American territory, in the State of Maine, watered by the river St. John and its tributaries, and floated down the river to the sea, when the same is shipped to the United States from the province of New Brunswick, that then, and in that case the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend all rights of carrying provided for by this section for such period as such export or other duty may be levied.

SEC. 5. That this act shall not take effect until the 1st day of July, 1873, and shall not apply to any article of merchandise therein mentioned which shall be held in bond on that day by the customs officers of the United States.

Approved March 1, 1873.

A bill to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States in bond and without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country from or to the British Dominions in North America.

SEC. 2. That whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River Canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is or may be detrimental to the interests of the United States or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, to issue a proclamation to that effect, whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal; and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act, or the President may, in his discretion, when he is satisfied there is any such discrimination, prohibit the use of said canals to any such foreign vessel. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect, in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected, and said prohibition, if ordered, shall cease.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. OATES. After the speech to which we have just listened, I would like permission to put a question to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] with reference to the character of this proposed enactment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] seems to construe the measure before the House as a non-intercourse act. Is it not the clear intent of this measure to clothe the President with power by his proclamation to subject Canadian or English goods to the payment of duty under our tariff laws when they come to our territory? Is not that the extent of the bill under consideration?

Mr. FARQUHAR. This is a question of transit, not of duty.

Mr. McCREARY. Perhaps the most satisfactory answer to the gentleman's question would be to let the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Not now. If the gentleman in his speech on this subject did not sufficiently explain the bill, he could not do it now by having the bill read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has yielded fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply indebted to my friend Governor McCREARY, of Kentucky, who so admirably fills the position of acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for his courtesy. And now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the bill.

I do not know of anything for which many of our public men are more noted than for the very elaborate network of webs they can throw around the simplest subject, in order, if possible, to make them more indistinct and obscure. Those who had not studied the subject, believed when they heard the President's message read that they understood this question—a question going back until it is almost lost in the mazes of the past; going back under treaty after treaty and conference after conference, to 1818. And now, listening to the utterances of the distinguished statesmen who have occupied the floor for the last three or four days, we would be led to believe that the question is one which is still to be left for settlement to that charmed circle of diplomats of which my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] is such a splendid representative.

In my judgment the American people have grown tired of this continual haggling over this controversy. It has been used in Canada by the political men in charge of its affairs to continually alienate, irritate, and goad those people so that they might thereby keep themselves in power. They are like a man who was managing a wild beast, and who, when asked why he never permitted a large sore on its leg to heal, said that if it once healed he would lose his control of the animal. If the Tories were to permit this cause of irritation to be removed, there would be a perfect bond of friendship and brotherly love between the Canadians and ourselves. We have no quarrel with the Canadians. We love those people. We are willing to go right along hand in hand with them, without any design either upon their territory or upon themselves.

It is their officials we are after, for it is evidently the hidden policy of Prime Minister Salisbury, in England, and his representative, Sir John Macdonald, in Canada, to keep alive this constant irritation. Can it be believed for one moment that the local magistrates in Nova Scotia and elsewhere would continuously pander to the prejudices and small pecuniary interests of their own fishermen by continuously harassing and injuring the fishermen of this country when it could be abruptly terminated by those officials if they really desired entire friendship between us? No. On the contrary, it seems to have been their settled policy, instead of allaying this irritation, to continually fan it into almost a flame, thereby arresting, as they believed, any tendency on the part of those people towards annexation to the United States. That class of men can only be reached by the passage of a bill of this kind, and holding it up to the Canadian people as a mirror so that they can see reflected the consequences of their own acts.

We must bring this question home to the Canadian people, so that they will understand they can not be considered neighborly when they are continually arresting, on the most trifling pretexts, the captains of our vessels, fining them, not permitting them to purchase bait or supplies, denying then even the demands that humanity would suggest—of shelter in case of storm—the ordinary facilities that you would extend to a wayfarer or a "tramp." There is nothing neighborly about that, or in using the American canals for the commerce of Canada free of tolls, and then when tolls are imposed upon Canadian canals by a system of rebates to Canadian vessels causing the greater portion of the commerce to be diverted into Canadian vessels.

The President thoroughly understands this subject. He says there is only one way you can reach it, and that is by a sharp retaliatory process to have those Canadians understand that as a matter of self-interest they must abandon the policy permitted by their Sir John Macdonalds and men of his class. That is the plain English of it. There is not in this country to-day a man of ordinary intelligence who does not comprehend that the President has taken the only possible way of getting at this question and that his message meets the wishes of the popular heart. When I said that it is a "magnificent campaign document" I said that which every American believes and which every man on the other side of the House knows to be true, for it is a document which was demanded by the people.

It shows that the President is in harmony with and anticipates the wishes of the American people. By that document the President proves himself equal to the occasion. That is what I meant. I never get down to the level of some of these gentlemen who put a small partisan tinge into all discussions of this kind. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Gentlemen, I will yield to any interruptions. My time is at your command if you want to jump into this fight. [Renewed laughter and applause.] There is not a man on the other side who has made a speech on this question who has not been guilty of what in polite terms would be called dissimulation. That is the diplomatic term.

Mr. GEST. Why does not the President use the power he has?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why does he not use the power he has? What is the use of making three or four bites of one small cherry? What is the use of simply stopping transit in bulk, when by reaching their tolls we also prevent the other unjust discriminations. Do you want only partial relief? Is that your idea? Or, to use a Western phrase, do you believe in having at once a "roundup" of all these annoyances and vexations by getting rid of them?

Mr. GEST. There is power enough in the President's hands.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, my friend, in answer to that question, you and every other Republican on that side of the House will vote to give this additional power to the President, and will be very glad to have an opportunity of doing so; and when you go home you will forget your partisanship for the time being and pose as patriots and will say that you voted for this measure in the name of the American people as an educational measure that you thought would have a salutary effect on the Canadians.

Mr. STRUBLE. Would it not be well, if sixty million people are going to jump upon five millions, to begin with one foot at a time?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why, my dear sir, we are not going to "jump" on them. We are going to do what you would do with a neighbor's boy who is impertinent and saucy and who annoys and injures your children and family. You box his ears in order that he may learn to behave himself; you educate him, that is what you do.

Nobody wants to whip those poor Canadians, stretched along 4,000 miles of territory, although I see the commander of their militia resoluted last night that he was going to drive us right into the Gulf. [Laughter.] That is exactly in the line with the teachings of their Tory ministers, appealing to the fears, passions, and prejudices of those people. In perfect harmony with that style of argument I want the Clerk to read the following article, which I find in the St. Louis Republican.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, certainly; these interruptions embellish a speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: When our canals are closed to Canadian commerce, how are we going to get our whole Northwestern commerce out of Lake Superior into Lake Huron without going into Canada?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. My friend, you will find that in the West where I come from they do not measure everything as a matter of dollars and cents. I would not be surprised if some economical and unpatriotic Yankee did not propose to turn Bunker Hill Monument into a shot tower. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is no answer. I want to know how, if our canals are closed to Canadian commerce, our Northwestern commerce is going to get out of Lake Superior into Lake Huron without going through Canada, inasmuch as a portion of the existing channel is within Canadian territory.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We would find a remedy if the gentleman is correct. He may be mistaken, and in the mean time I would educate these Canadians in ways of neighboring conduct and good behavior.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Educate! Nonsense! We are talking of retaliation. Canada can close you out of Lake Superior to-morrow.

Mr. TARSNEY. No, she can not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. She can.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, gentlemen, no war. Peace—the white-robed angel of peace—hovers over this scene. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is an embellishment for you.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. When this interruption occurred I had sent to the Clerk's desk to have read an article from the London Standard, the recognized organ of the Tory administration, which I find in the St. Louis Republic, the principal Democratic newspaper in the Mississippi Valley. That paper prints it and denounces this Tory bluster in suitable terms. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the London Standard.]

It will be well for the President and Government of the United States to remember that Canada is a dependency of Great Britain, and that if the necessity should unfortunately arise she has behind her the guns of English ironclads. If our American cousins fail to understand this allusion; if, in deference to the tone of coarse brutality, which seems to be the distinguishing feature of their domestic politics, they invite us to reply to their insults in a strain they will comprehend, perhaps we may be allowed to remind them of the Trent affair. If we have to deal with a nation of filibusters let us at least know it. We will tell our American cousins frankly that we have not advanced so far toward ideal Christianity that we are prepared to turn our cheeks to the trans-Atlantic smiter.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There never was a bully or a braggart who was not at heart a physical coward when he met his match. There never was a Tory administration that has not from the same instinct cowardly yielded when confronted with a nation that can cope with it on equal terms.

A MEMBER. That is true.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is true. The former boast that "Britain rules the waves" has given way under Tory administration to "peace with honor." That is the motto you will find to-day of the Tory administration of England when they have a serious difficulty to face with any powerful nation.

The Tory Standard need not fling in our teeth the Trent affair. Every American remembers it. It occurred when we were in the throes of a great civil war; when the question of the perpetuity of the Republic hung in the balance. But things have changed since then. We are now a united nation of 60,000,000 people marching together under one flag to a common destiny, and not at all worried about the recurrence of any more Trent affairs.

My only object in calling attention to this gross and brutal article was that this House would recognize at once how well that Tory organ portrays the character of the ministry with which we have to deal—a ministry that is to-day a disgrace to civilization in its treatment of its own subjects, being the only ministry in modern times which murders its political prisoners, as the death of Mandeville and the cruel treatment of Dillon attest.

Their bluster and their bluff alarms no one. In the event of war they would need every ironclad to take care of the English Channel, for it has only been a few months since their own distinguished military general, Wolseley, explained to them in what a helpless and defenseless condition their own coast was. And then they have before their eyes constantly the danger of Russia in India, only waiting to see England involved in war with any nation to accomplish its designs there.

No, there is no fear of war; none whatever. The loss to them in India would not be their only peril. It would also mean a verification of the prophecy of Thomas Davis that "England's difficulty would be Ireland's opportunity." [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe it will be but a short time before increased intelligence will cause the English people to banish forever from their councils their Salisburys, their Balfours, and their Macdonalds, and in their places we will find men who by justice at home to their own people and the avoidance of irritation abroad will permit us to live with them in perfect bonds of friendship and good-will.

And here permit me to say that so far as the English people are concerned, we entertain no bitterness towards them. For that great mass of Englishmen who are following the leadership of Gladstone we have the warmest feelings of friendship and love, and if their devoted leader, Hon. William E. Gladstone, the greatest Englishman of this age, should come to this country he would receive an ovation from the American people second to none. [Great applause on the Democratic side.] It should show our affection for him as a representative of justice and humanity, just as the silent journey of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, when here, showed the contempt the American people had for Toryism and the representatives of its brutal policy. [Applause.]

And this sentiment is not confined to one political party, but is the sentiment, I believe, of the great mass of the American people. But I have wasted enough time on the London Standard.

I can not longer dwell upon this subject, as I am reminded that my time has nearly expired, but as a fitting conclusion I will ask the Clerk to read this portion of the President's message; and I ask the attention of the House for a moment, and turning aside from partisanship, I ask gentlemen on both sides to join me in a hearty indorsement of its clear, sound American doctrines.

The Clerk read as follows:

The course which I have outlined and the recommendations made relate to the honor and dignity of our country and the protection and preservation of the rights and interests of all our people. A government does but half its duty when it protects its citizens at home and permits them to be imposed upon and humiliated by the unfair and overreaching disposition of other nations. If we invite our people to rely upon arrangements made for their benefit abroad, we should see to it that they are not deceived; and if we are generous and liberal to a neighboring country our people should reap the advantage of it by a return of liberality and generosity.

These are subjects which partisanship should not disturb or confuse. Let us survey the ground calmly and moderately, and having put aside other means of settlement, if we enter upon the policy of retaliation let us pursue it firmly, with a determination only to subserve the interests of our people and maintain the high standard and the becoming pride of American citizenship.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

[Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Is that a speech?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, it is a speech, and you can contrast it with the platitudes uttered by your candidate who is depending for success upon his grandfather's reputation; but let me tell the gentleman that the Harrison boom will be like the clack in the old song, it stopped, short, never to run again, the day that the old man died. [Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. McCREARY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY].

Mr. TARSNEY. 'Mid such confusion who can tell
The road to heaven or to—sheol. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I come from a State upon the border line of the British dominions in America. I think that there is no State in the American Union that would be so much affected by the passage of the pending bill as the State I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor—the State of Michigan. Nearly, or quite, 700 miles of our State coast borders upon the line of Canada. The immense commerce passing through the lakes from Chicago, through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal from Duluth, and passing through the straits and rivers St. Clair and Detroit, is larger by 25 per cent. than the entire commerce that passes through the great Suez Canal. Lines of railroad extend from Halifax on the extreme east to the city of Chicago on the lakes, and one of the great trunk-lines of America traverses the district I have the honor to represent, the Grand Trunk Railway.

I have seen in my day something of the conduct of our Canadian neighbors that induces me to think that they are not entirely our friends. While God knows that I abhor trouble, I abhor the possibility of war, I abhor retaliation in any form, yet, sir, if it must come to this pass that the rights of the humblest American citizen are denied either at home or abroad, I for my part would rather see the wheels of commerce stop, and every vessel upon the Great Lakes tied up, than that these rights and privileges, I repeat, of the humblest American citizen should be unprotected [Applause.]

Now, what does this mean? It means this, sir, and I may be permitted to refer to a little personal history. I happened at one time in my life to have been a sailor, and sailed these great inland seas for seven years. During that time I never saw or heard of a Canadian vessel in distress in American waters where an American vessel with an American captain and an American crew did not voluntarily go to their aid and rescue. What is the other side of the picture? I have seen, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, and it is a matter of record, too, that where our vessels sailed through Canadian waters or upon the Canadian line between the United States and Canada they were subject to seizure and were seized by Canadian authorities because they went to the rescue of human life and property.

I appeal to you as American citizens, as American legislators, whether or not such acts on the part of Canada, in the name of humanity, should not be compelled to cease by some process or other; but by whatever process, that a stop must be put to it.

If it is to be by the peaceful method, then let that method be pursued. But, Mr. Speaker, if it be necessary to pursue some other method, then we will take care of that other method; and if you will only authorize the State of Michigan to do so, we will take care of Canada and make a couple of good Democratic States out of her in short order. [Laughter.] I say this, sir, in no boastful spirit. I know their disposition; I know their nature; I know their character, and I know their conduct towards our people. What we desire is peace; but it must be peace upon honorable terms, and no threat, such as that which has just been read in the presence of an American Congress, can deter us upon the Northwestern border from simply saying it is not retaliation but simply justice we desire and justice we shall have.

Now, let the English people and the Canadian people distinctly understand that their neighbors across the border, although they desire peace and harmony, yet they desire reciprocity, they desire to trade with them upon fair and equal terms, but they will not under any circumstances submit to an insult. [Applause.]

I shall not consume further time of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied five minutes of his time.

Mr. TARSNEY. I yield the time back to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, during the past four days this House has presented a somewhat extraordinary spectacle. We have had an elaborate discussion, in which the absence of controversy seemed to be the distinguishing feature. We have had four days of animated and interesting debate; but until this afternoon there seemed to be an absolute absence of anything like a difference of opinion.

The measure pending before the House for its consideration is the bill known as the retaliation measure. The speeches which have been delivered have been devoted to the President's message, or rather perhaps with greater accuracy I should say to the President's messages. On the question presented by the bill itself there appears to be no division—none whatever. With a single exception, I do not believe that there is a member of the House on either side of it who will find it in his conscience or his courage to oppose the bill on its final passage.

Even the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who, so to speak, has transmitted a speech in bond to the Clerk of the House, has thought it prudent to preface his eloquence by the declaration that he did not arise to oppose the passage of the pending bill; and many of us are profoundly grateful for the declaration, as it accounts for the composure with which we approached the perusal of his essay.

But the distinguishing address on the other side, the one that has furnished the key-note to this discussion, was the very able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], to whom and to whom alone is due the credit of lifting the debate to a high plane of parliamentary procedure. But I regret to say that while the speech was eloquent it lacked those elements of candor and fairness that would have made it the greatest speech of the session.

In that speech I find that the gentleman from Illinois found no fault with the measure itself, but he appears to have three grounds of criticism on the message. One was that the message of the President was unnecessary; another was that the death of Article XXIX did not occur as stated by the President; and the third was almost an impeachment of the conduct of the Administration on the fishery question. This treaty, the rejection of which has evoked the bill now before the House, was spoken of as almost a conspiracy to deliver over to the Canadian exporters the commerce of the United States. In discussing these three questions briefly, I think the criticism that Article XXIX had not expired, as the President claimed it had, may be passed by as almost unworthy of discussion. Nobody pretends that it is in force today. The gentleman states that it has been abrogated by the action of the Canadian Government, and whether it "died in the night"—to quote the language of the gentleman from Illinois—or whether it was killed in the daytime by Canadian violations, is scarcely a subject of discussion worthy the attention of the American Congress.

The important question before this body is whether there is in existence now any valid treaty stipulation which would arrest or impede this House or stand in the way of the passage of legislation of this character. On this subject all are agreed. The treaty stipulation is abrogated and the House is free to enact this law.

Now, as to the necessity for asking these additional powers. The gentlemen on the other side of the House profess to be agreed that the demand was unnecessary, and yet it is stated here that after the passage of the act of 1877 the President was justified in withholding the exercise of the powers conferred on him by that measure until the conclusion of the negotiations which had been entered upon between this Government and the Government of Great Britain; and these negotiations failed by reason of the rejection of the treaty in the Senate. It may be that I have misapprehended the language of the gentleman from Illinois, but I believe that his language is clearer than he himself believes, and that the views he entertains struggled to his lips and found expression in spite of diplomatic reserve. [Applause.]

There is at least no open criticism of the action of the President in suspending the exercise of these powers until the conclusion of the negotiation recently undertaken, and which failed in the rejection of the treaty by the Senate. I think that gentlemen must concede the President was right in that action. I do not think there will be any person even on that side of the Chamber who will say that the President did not act wisely in refraining from the exercise of all the powers given to him until there had been negotiation and an attempt to make an amicable settlement. These negotiations were made, and have failed by the action of the Senate; and then when the President of the United States has thought proper to address to Congress a message placing before the representatives of the people the actual condition of our relations with Canada, he must forsooth be charged, as he has been charged by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], with dissimulation in his treatment of the Congress of the United States.

Why, sir, I believe that on this side of the Chamber there is no division of opinion as to the propriety of an executive officer consulting the representatives of the people on any important occasion, and above all, before taking a step which might reach the degree of bringing about a rupture between this country and Great Britain. Was it not good evidence of patriotism to consult the law-making body, and to consult this body, which holds the purse-strings, upon a matter which might lead to open rupture, so as to be sure of the active co-operation of both sides of the House before launching on a particular line of policy which might lead to the most important results? It ought not to lie in the mouths of those members of Congress who are representatives of the people to criticise an executive officer for asking their judgment before exercising the extreme limits of extraordinary powers conferred upon him in the disposition of international matters.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, let me ask him here did not Congress extend its counsel to the President in its act of March 3, 1887?

Mr. COCKRAN. I believe I have spoken to very little purpose if the gentleman from Iowa does not understand the burden of my contention. It is that notwithstanding the powers granted by the act of 1887 there was a suspension of any exercise of them by common consent of the people of this country, with a view of seeing whether the matter could be settled by negotiation, and if there were any division of opinion the representatives of the minority were violating their duty to their constituents by sitting silent and thus sustaining it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman consider the condemnation of the press and the condemnation by the minority of this House and in their Congressional conventions any condemnation of the treaty now negotiated with the Canadian authorities as amounting to anything?

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman does not meet the occasion. It is not the course of the President which is condemned; it is the course of the Canadian authorities that the people of this country condemn. The people of this country are in favor of a settlement by treaty or negotiation; and what I say is that while these negotiations were pending in this country not even the stalwart Republican convention of the gentleman's district called upon the President to exercise any of the powers conferred on him by the act of 1887. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I say that the Senate and the country have condemned it.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman is referring to one thing and I am referring to another. I say simply that the country has been in favor of suspending any action pending negotiations. Congress approved the grant of the power, and the people ratified that action, but it was suspended in view of the negotiations, and nobody then criticised the President for entering upon negotiations which everybody hoped would reach a satisfactory and honorable and just and equitable conclusion. And it is because those negotiations have fallen by the rejection of the treaty that the President has thought proper, before he takes one step further, to consult the law-making body of this Government, to come back to the people through their representatives and ask them to clothe him with the powers which, as soon as they have been granted, you gentlemen will see exercised to the fullest measure of your satisfaction and the fullest gratification of your patriotism. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, this criticism I believe may be dismissed with very few words. The character of the questions put to me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], than whom there is no more alert Representative on the other side of the House, shows the barrenness of the controversy on that side.

Now, if I may have the indulgence of the House to pass for a moment to the graver questions involved in this discussion, I will proceed to answer the imputation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] who charged the representatives of this Government with an act of betrayal of American rights to the Canadian authorities.

The gentleman from Illinois charged, in his own language, that there was "an unwritten postscript" to the treaty, and that the postscript was an agreement between Mr. Bayard and the Canadian minister that all that has been done in this House, the introduction of the Mills bill, the action of the Ways and Means Committee which preceded it, the vote by which the bill was passed, was but part of this conspiracy of betrayal secretly entered into and carried out with dissimulation and almost with treason. What, sir! To charge the President of the United States with having negotiated a treaty and with trying to hoodwink the people of the United States into the belief that it was designed for one purpose while the Canadian authorities were told that it was designed for another purpose; to charge him with having treated the Senate of the United States with dissimulation while extending confidence to the Canadian envoy, and with leaving the people of this country to learn for the first time the true character of their treaty from the declarations of a Canadian minister in the Canadian House of Parliament—this is to charge the President with a crime graver than treason, with a crime which has no parallel in the history of the executive office of the United States since the foundation of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, may I be pardoned for a few moments while I analyze the character of the evidence upon which this grave charge rests? May I be permitted but five minutes more, having opened up this subject and placed it before the House?

By unanimous consent Mr. COCKRAN'S time was extended for ten minutes, with the understanding that a vote should be taken at ten minutes past 4 instead of at 4 o'clock, as previously ordered.

Mr. COCKRAN. I was about to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], in all fairness and in all candor, upon what evidence he rests this grave charge which he has preferred against the President of the United States, but I find the answer in his own speech, to which I listened with such attention as I have seldom given to any utterance upon this floor. In that speech the gentleman incorporated certain remarks which are reported to have been made by Sir Charles Tupper, an account which that gentleman gave of a conversation with Mr. Bayard.

Mr. HITT. Our plenipotentiary.

Mr. COCKRAN. He was a plenipotentiary, but while he was a plenipotentiary he did not cease to be Mr. Bayard. The statement was that in a conversation between Mr. Bayard and Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Bayard declared that he believed in reciprocity of trade with Canada, and that the settlement of vexatious questions would tend to facilitate that consummation; and then Sir Charles Tupper himself added that this treaty formed a basis of settlement which would undoubtedly be satisfactory to both countries, and therefore a step in that direction.

Did not the gentleman himself take occasion to say that he favored reciprocity with Canada? Did not he take occasion to say that he believed it would be for the interests of both countries, and that if reciprocity could be obtained on proper terms it would be a most desirable and most important gain to the financial and industrial interests of this country? And has the gentleman from Illinois the privilege to say on this floor that which Mr. Bayard may not say in conversation? And because Sir Charles Tupper chose to argue in his own House of Parliament in favor of this treaty upon the basis of what Mr. Bayard had said to him, therefore we are told that the Mills bill and all the proceedings that have been had in this Congress during this session upon that subject are evidence of a conspiracy in which the President took the leading part and through which the majority of the House of Representatives were delivered over bound hand and foot by the Executive, who was false to his own country, a traitor to his trust, and that, too, without even the poor consideration that is usually extended to the traitor as the price of his treason.

But the proof of it, forsooth, is that we have remitted duties to the amount of $1,800,000 a year; I believe that is the amount the gentleman said.

Mr. HITT. Sir Charles Tupper said it.

Mr. COCKRAN. One million eight hundred thousand dollars, then, as Sir Charles Tupper said. Well, we have remitted duties upon articles imported, I believe, from every country on the globe. We have remitted duties to a far greater extent upon articles imported from other countries; and the gentleman will see that if our surrender took that form, then we must have surrendered not only to Canada but to almost every other country with which we have done business. If this Administration loves the British Government so much, does not the gentleman perceive that in this general surrender, in this sale of the American market to all the countries with which we maintain commercial intercourse, the seeds have been sown of an inevitable quarrel among the purchasers; that if England has bought it and France has bought it and Germany has bought it, these various countries must quarrel about their purchase? No man who loves England wants to precipitate a quarrel upon her hands. The British lion may love to roar, but for many years he has not displayed any disposition to claw. [Laughter and applause.] If the proof which the gentleman has advanced here of the act of treason be weighed with other acts we have performed it will be found that in the passage of this Mills bill we have made sale of ourselves all round the globe, leaving the purchasers to struggle over the security of the purchase.

Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of this controversy which the gentleman probably did not weigh to its full extent. He has charged the majority on this side with entering into this conspiracy. I know not whether he meant that they entered into it with their eyes open or were hoodwinked into it by the dissimulation and artifices of the Administration; but there are men on this side who, I believe, would be the last in the world to countenance the sale of American privileges or American dignity to the British Government. There are men on this side whom the gentleman from Illinois has charged with participation in this act of treason, who remember the Government of Great Britain with feelings which would prompt them to anything but an act of friendship; who remember the fact that the gallows has been for ages the bulwark of her governmental force and the hangman the apostle of her civilization.

And it is us and men like us that the gentleman from Illinois has charged, forsooth, with giving over the independence and the glory and the prosperity of this country to Canada as a free gift; and all for what? Has the gentleman shown any reason which would justify, has he shown even a temptation which would prompt, any American statesman to such an act of extravagance, of folly, and of crime as this? What is the bribe? Canada does not seem to have appreciated our surrender at the value set upon it by the gentleman from Illinois, because, according to the gentleman himself, this treaty which the Republicans condemn as an absolute surrender of American rights to Canadian fishermen was viewed with such suspicion by the Canadians that it became necessary for Sir Charles Tupper to broach the subject of the conspiracy in order to secure its ratification by the Canadian Parliament. If we had surrendered everything to Canada, if, as the Republican Senate of the United States considered, this was such a surrender that the treaty itself should be rejected as a blot upon our fair fame and an injury to our international influence, is it possible that Canadians themselves were so purblind and short-sighted that it was necessary to re-enforce that surrender with the further gift of the American market and a further betrayal of American interests and American rights? Does the gentleman really contend that such a proposition as that will stand before the people of the United States?

Sir, this charge scarcely deserves refutation. To refute it or even to analyze it seems to dignify it. The administration of Grover Cleveland, the motives which prompt his official acts, need no explanation to this country. The gentleman from Illinois, as a man of sense, knows that it needs no explanation to cause the people to believe them to be prompted by patriotism and inspired by loyalty. It will not do at this stage of this campaign to attempt to manufacture campaign thunder of this character for the reason that the people know how to test its sincerity. [Derisive laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I greet that applause with pleasure. I know to what it refers, and I adopt the declaration of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. The message was a "campaign document;" and it was a great one, because it appealed to the intelligence and patriotism of the American people, whom the President trusts and whom you gentlemen appear to distrust, whose intelligence he relies on and whose intelligence you think you can delude. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do not be mistaken about the effect of these assaults. The sneer which you level at the President the country knows is but a thin disguise of the respect you feel for him. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] Do not misapprehend for a moment the view of the electors of these United States. They know full well that if you say he has reached his present degree of success merely by luck, you will not insinuate it was compassed by dishonor. You may cavil at his qualifications for the Presidency; the Senators of your faith at the other end of this building will tell you that never during his incumbency have they been able to invade his privileges or limit his prerogatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You may sneer and say he is not a great man; there is not one of you who will deny that he is an honest man. And he is a great man in the eyes of this country, not because he is the possessor of qualities which lift him away beyond the mass of his fellows, but because he is a type of the common citizenship of this land; and his success, the success of his administration, proves that there is in this country, throughout the common ranks of all its citizens, ample talent, honesty, and integrity to carry on this Government, even if the race of so-called statesmen should have passed away.

You have the uncrowned king, you have the shepherd of the people, you have I do not know what, and I do not know how to describe him. [Laughter.] He has had so many titles, the mind is confused and paralyzed when it contemplates his greatness; but, sir, before the mass of our people at the ballot-box he was vanquished by the modest and simple type of American citizenship represented by Grover Cleveland. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.] Let me remind this House it will not do to say that the President, whose four years of administration show not one single act for which his supporters blush, is wanting in greatness. If to rise from the humblest station to the greatest dignity in the world; if he who has risen by force of virtue and not by the sacrifice of it, who has walked the whole pathway of life in the full sunlight of publicity, who after four years' administration of the highest office in the world finds himself renominated by the spontaneous voice of his party, who has never held a trust that those who confided it to him did not seek to extend the term of his service, who by the confidence and respect of his fellow-citizens wields to-day a power far greater than that with which the Constitution clothes him, who after four years in the administration of the greatest office in the world finds that the party leader whom he vanquished while he was yet untried now flies, I think prudently if ingloriously, from a renewal of the conflict [applause on the Democratic side of the House], who has no ambiguous acts to defend or unwise epistolary expressions to explain [laughter and applause on the Democratic side]; if this man be not great, then greatness is not a quality which should be encouraged on democratic soil. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Instead of the ephemeral, dazzling, and often dangerous qualities which, among the unthinking, go to make up greatness, give me his strength and the virtue, the robust dignity, and the sterling integrity of our President who is in the White House, of our candidate, who will be in it for four years more. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. I ask the Speaker to notify me within three minutes of the expiration of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to do it.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the message which the President sent to Congress a short time ago and the bill accompanying it, which we are now considering, have been treated by the country as campaign documents. If anything were needed to emphasize that conclusion reached by the country it would be the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. He has failed to treat—and he could have done so, as he is an able lawyer—he has failed to treat the real issue and has expended nearly all his time upon a eulogy of the President instead of discussing the pending issue. Why he has done so may be easily inferred.

Mr. Speaker, our Government is a Government of law, a written Constitution and written laws. The language of the Constitution and the laws, is "Thou shalt," and "thou shalt not." Our Government is not only one of written laws, but, in addition, it is one of limited powers, and only the powers expressly conferred or arising by necessary implication can be exercised by any officer of the Government. Therefore it is that Congress has always heretofore been guarded and always will be in the future, I trust, in the granting of discretionary power to any officer of the Government. The grant of discretionary power is one which can be justified only on the principle of a controlling necessity.

To vest discretionary powers in an executive officer except in cases of overwhelming necessity is something which, in my opinion, should not be done if it can be accomplished in any other mode by ordinary legislation. Therefore, we should proceed with great deliberation and with exceeding care in determining what discretionary powers should be vested in any department of the Government or any official, I care not who he may be. The President has the power to negotiate treaties by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present. The Senate is as necessary to the negotiation of the treaty as the President. In England the Crown alone has the power to negotiate treaties without reference to Parliament, but in our country it was thought best that two-thirds of a quorum of the Senate should concur with the President in the ratification of treaties.

Now, sir, I claim that under our Government it requires the same power to revoke a treaty that it does to make a treaty. We have heard much during the argument here in reference to the cancellation of treaties for infraction and the repeal of treaties by acts of Congress. There is no doubt in my opinion of the power of Congress to cancel a treaty or any article of a treaty with a foreign nation if there be infraction; but Congress is the judge of the infraction. The orderly and proper method would seem to be for the President to lay before Congress the evidence and facts relating to the infraction, and thereupon Congress would judge of their sufficiency and act accordingly. Now, what is the situation we are dealing with?

Congress passed a law in 1883 requiring the President to give notice of the termination of certain articles of the treaty of 1871, naming the articles in the body of that law; and we find that the President of the United States issued a proclamation calling the attention of the world to the fact, and the other treaty-making power itself, that these particular articles of the treaty should terminate in two years. Article XXIX was not mentioned either in the law or in the proclamation of the President, and Congress has not at any time taken any step looking to the abrogation of Article XXIX. If my proposition be a true one that it requires an act of Congress for the revocation or repeal of a treaty, then it must follow, as the night the day, that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 must still be a subsisting obligation as between the United States and Great Britain. And we are not wanting in judicial authority in support of that view, for I have here in my hands a decision in the case of Taylor et al. vs. Morton, reported in 2 Curtis's Reports, page 459, in which case the court in pronouncing its opinion uses this language:

> To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons which approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of the nation is a matter of the utmost gravity and delicacy; but the power to do so is prerogative, of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power in any case I do not believe. That it must reside somewhere and be applicable to all cases I am convinced. I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress. That inasmuch as treaties must continue to operate as part of our municipal law, and be obeyed by the people, applied by the judiciary, and executed by the President while they continue unrepealed, and inasmuch as the power of repealing these municipal laws must reside somewhere, and nobody other than Congress can possess it, then legislative power is applicable to such laws whenever they relate to subjects which the Constitution has placed under that legislative power. In conformity with these views was the action of Congress in passing the act of July, 1798, declaring the treaties with France no longer obligatory on the United States.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, doth it appear that Congress must intervene to repeal or terminate a treaty, and although there may be an infraction of the treaty, the proper authority to judge of that infraction and to declare the abrogation of the treaty is the Congress of the United States. Now, sir, what is the condition of Article XXIX in view of this plain proposition of law? Article XXIX is a subsisting obligation between the United States and the Government of Great Britain. Well, sir, if Article XXIX be a subsisting obligation between the two Governments, we have the vantage ground. The Canadian authorities have violated it, and why should not the President demand redress under the act of March 3, 1887? He himself declares in his message, apparently to get rid of his duty, that Article XXIX was abrogated, that it fell with the other articles, but the authority I have cited shows that it did not fall. It was logically necessary for the President to dispose of Article XXIX in some way, for if it were conceded by him to be still in force, the execution of the power conferred by the act of March 3, 1887, would have been a most manifest retaliation, and would have filled the measure of even the late message of the President.

Now, with Article XXIX as a subsisting obligation, the power the President had under the act of March 3, 1887, was so broad as to include everything he should do and more than he should do to bring Canada to terms. What were his powers under that act? First, to deny entrance to vessels belonging to the British dominions to our ports; second, to deny the entrance of fish or any product of said dominions; third, to deny the entrance of any other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. Every power necessary was placed by that act in the hands of the President of the United States, and he could have exercised any one or all of them. If it would have worked great injury to the Northwest, or to any other section of the country, to enforce the provisions of the act, it was not necessary to exert the full power conferred upon him. He could have issued a proclamation giving notice to the Government of Great Britain that unless certain things were done in a certain time he would issue his proclamation, carrying out one, two, or three of the provisions of the act. He need not have taken a step that would have imperiled the interests of this country one particle to bring about the result which was desired, which was to bring Canada to terms. But he did not choose to exercise that authority; he chose rather to send to Congress what I must regard as a buncombe political campaign message, with a view to retrieving his lost fortunes with the Irish-American citizens whom he had alienated by his vacillating course in his dealings with Great Britain.

Now, sir, I say that Article XXIX in every respect has been treated all along by the British Government as being in force. It has been treated all along by our own Government as being in force. The Secretary of the Treasury, on July 13, 1887, said it was in force. Canada has acted upon it all along as if it were in force. I think there have been such infractions of it as to fully justify its cancellation, for outrages and indignities without number have been heaped upon our citizens by the Canadian authorities, but the President seems to have formed no adequate conception of these wrongs, for he comes to Congress and asks for authority to deal with a different subject.

And what does he now seem to want? Why, authority to deal with transportation in bond through the United States. And why does he want this? That he may throw the traffic of Canada, consisting perhaps of $50,000,000, to the Canadian railways, and take that traffic away from the New England railways; and that is the secret of this affair. A member of the kitchen cabinet of the Administration and a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway—a man whose fortunes would be enhanced, though large now, by having that traffic driven from the New England railways and given to the Canadian—makes a four-hour speech in advocacy of this measure.

To benefit the Canadian railways is the scheme. That is the principal object of this bill. This scheme is intended as the visitation of a judgment of the President upon the New England States for their glorious Republican majorities. [Applause] That is the animus of this bill. Why, sir, when did the President arrive at the conclusion that we were treated badly by the Welland Canal, or by the St. Lawrence canals, or by the other Canadian canal companies? What did he state when he submitted his first message to Congress? The President said when submitting the treaty to Congress which the Senate has rejected:

> As the documents and papers referred to will supply full information of the positions taken under my administration by the representatives of the United States, as well as those occupied by the representatives of the Government of Great Britain, it is not considered necessary or expedient to repeat them in this message. But I believe the treaty will be found to contain a just, honorable, and therefore satisfactory solution of the difficulties which have clouded our relations with our neighbors on our northern border.

Why, Mr. Speaker, he says that if that treaty had been ratified by the Senate all our difficulties would have been settled. Our relations with Canada would be of the best possible character. The President, in the exuberance of the delight which the ratification of the treaty would have afforded him, goes on to predict the marvelous prosperity that would result to both nations in the event of peaceful relations being effectually secured by that treaty. Not one word at the time the message was sent in to the Senate of the United States about any other difficulties with Canada than those arising out of the fisheries. More than that, the Senate of the United States, sir, understanding that there were wrongs done by the canal companies, otherwise the Canadian Government, to our people, passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish information as to such wrongs. That resolution was passed by the Senate on the 30th day of January, 1888, and was replied to by the Treasury Department on the 7th of February, 1888. And what did the Secretary of the Treasury say in his reply:

> In reply to the first inquiry, I have to state that no communication has been had with the Dominion of Canada, nor have any agreements been arrived at touching the transportation of goods since the abrogation of the articles of the treaty referred to.

No communication had, no inquiry made. The President quiet, the Secretary of the Treasury quiet. Not one word about these wrongs that have been committed upon our people up to the 7th day of February, 1888, not a word about it until this message came here a few days ago.

Did he find it necessary to do something to make some show of patriotism and indignation regarding these wrongs? He and his Secretary of State had belittled the fishery wrongs. It would seem that something had to be done, so the message comes. Now what inference are we to draw from this state of facts? John Stewart Mills says, "The great business of life is to draw inferences." Words are cheap things. Grandiloquent messages are cheap things, easily gotten up, but acts speak louder than words. What inference must we draw? We can not help but infer that the President instead of executing the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, desired to shift the controversy into a new field for campaign purposes. And this very bill now under consideration is itself a violation of Article XXIX, or it proposes the repeal of that article by indirection. Thus the Administration is bringing the country into a new complication and into an untenable position under international law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can not believe that anybody, Republican or Democrat, who will do that sort of thing is sincere and honest in his transactions. I can not think it is honest to do such a thing, for I am constrained thereby to believe that the President had no other purpose in sending this measure to Congress than to promote his chances of reelection and escape the great tariff issue that was before the country. But, Mr. Speaker, how are our friends on the other side placed in reference to this measure, the message, and this bill? They are going to vote as a unit for this bill, I believe. They want this bill enacted into a law, and what do they propose to do when it becomes a law? They propose to clothe the President with power to exclude all commercial relations with Canada and to prevent transportation in bond across the United States one way or the other of goods, wares, and merchandise.

But, sir, when a short time ago the Mills bill was under consideration in this House, what did our friends on the other side of the Chamber do? Did they then propose to exclude Canadian goods from our markets? Did they then think it would be well to have no further intercourse with Canada? Was not the subject of the wrongs of the Welland Canal and the other canals then a live subject known to the President, and could he not have informed his friends about it? Oh, no; neither the President or his friends thought of that. On the contrary, they were most solicitous for commerce with Canada, for they prepared and passed the Mills bill. And what did that do? Look at this list, which I have taken from the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN].

Articles.	Canadian rate.	United States rate.	Mills rate.
Beans	15 cents per bushel..	10 per cent	Free.
Pease	10 cents per bushel..	10 to 20 per cent	Free.
Tomatoes	30 cents per bushel..	10 per cent	Free.
All other vegetables, including sweet potatoes.	20 per cent	10 per cent	Free.
Plums	1 cent per pound...	1 cent per pound...	Free.
Currants	1 cent per pound...	1 cent per pound...	Free.
Peppermint and other essential oils.	20 per cent	25 per cent	Free.
Blacking	25 per cent	25 per cent	20 per cent.
Bricks	20 per cent	20 per cent	Free.
Brooms	25 per cent	25 per cent	20 per cent.
Brushes	25 per cent	25 per cent	20 per cent.
Flax (raw)	$20 per ton	$20 per ton	Free.
Flax (hackled)	$40 per ton	$40 per ton	Free.
Tow	$10 per ton	$10 per ton	Free.

We are to pay Canada duties, but Canada pays us no duties. That is Democratic reciprocity for you. That is Democratic retaliation, when it comes to downright acts. Among the articles proposed to be made free by the Mills bill is lumber. What about lumber? The Canadian Government owns the lumber of Canada, and therefore it was for the benefit of the Government of Canada that the Mills bill proposed to let lumber come in free. The benefit was to be conferred not upon the people of Canada, but upon the Canadian Government. That bill proposed also to make brick free, and plums and currants and other fruits, and vegetables. Now, sir, how do these two propositions comport, the request of the President now that he may have power given him to declare substantial non-intercourse with Canada, and his wish, expressed some time ago in his message and subsequently formulated into the Mills bill, that Canadian products shall be allowed to come within our borders free, although the Canadian Government charges us a duty when we send our like products into Canada?

What sort of consistency is that on the part of the President, or on the part of Democratic Representatives in Congress? It strikes me that that inconsistency is so bold, so flagrant, that he who runs may read insincerity and bad faith in it. No use talking, this message of the President is nothing more than an effort on his part to create a diversion from the tariff issue in favor of some new issue, which this Administration sadly needs at this time, but which will not, despite the words of the gentleman from New York, rescue it from the defeat and oblivion that await it on the ides of November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, what more? While this very Mills bill was being framed, our Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, as reported by Sir Charles Tupper, made a statement which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us, that there was but one way of obtaining what we wished. "You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse; you want relaxation in our tariff arrangements," etc.

"You will find"—

Continues Mr. Bayard—I give his closing language—

"You will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President, and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward march in the direction you propose, and accomplish steadily that which you would desire. It is the only way it can ever be attained."

I obtained that statement, made by Sir Charles Tupper, of his conversation with Mr. Bayard from the able and exhaustive speech of my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

There it is, Mr. Speaker. Our Secretary of State, while this fearful indignation is resting in the mind of the President, gives assurance to Sir Charles Tupper that Canada must look for free trade to the great Democratic party, and makes that pledge. But, Mr. Speaker, I understand that assurances have been given even beyond that. I ask the Clerk now to read what has appeared in the public prints, what I have extracted from the Philadelphia Press where it was published upon the authority of Zebulon L. White, the Washington correspondent of the Press, over his own signature.

The Clerk read as follows:

Simultaneously with the transmission of the President's recent retaliation message to Congress a private communication was transmitted by the Government of the United States to the British Government at London, assuring it that it need have no anxiety as to any official action that would be taken under the authority that the President had asked of Congress if it should be granted. Assurance was given that the United States would furnish no casus belli in connection with these matters.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this is a statement which has been published in the press without denial, that assurances have been given by this Government to the British Government that if this bill shall become a law no casus belli will be given by us, but that the President will execute the law in the same amiable and friendly spirit in which he negotiated the treaty. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] This makes it still more manifest than it was before that the message is mere buncombe, that it does not mean anything except to get authority to make some sort of a hurrah before the election in order, as I said before, to revive the failing political fortunes of the President. Assurances given by Secretary Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper that the Democratic party would give Canada free trade, and assurances given by the Administration to the Government of Great Britain that if this bill now pending shall become a law no casus belli will be given, that nothing will be done under it that would have a tendency to change the kindly and affectionate regard which this Administration seems to feel for Great Britain. Why, sir, with abundant power already in his hands and with these assurances given to Great Britain, is it not absurd for the President of the United States to ask for additional powers which he does not intend to execute?

Mr. Speaker, the President has pursued with reference to these transactions a course that has not to my mind been dignified or proper. He has not in my opinion met fairly and squarely the issue that has been presented to him by the Government of Great Britain. He has shown a want of familiarity with the national policy of our Government. He negotiated a treaty which proposed to surrender the most valuable of our rights, and based that surrender upon the fact that such a surrender had been made by the treaty of 1818. That is his only justification. He knew that our rights and the rights of our fishermen needed an extension beyond the limits placed upon them by the treaty of 1818, and all the correspondence of Secretary Bayard with the British Government pointed to the fact that he regarded an extension of those rights as necessary to the protection of American fishermen. How different, how very different, have been the utterances of the candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency in the various speeches which he has made, in which he has declared that the rights of the American people should be defended at home and abroad and that American labor should be protected by a high tariff instead of repealing existing duties and admitting into our country free of duty the products of a nation which is wronging our people.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the course of this debate, in view of the facts which have been developed, I am constrained to believe that this bill should not become a law; and I propose to vote against it. I think the President has now abundant power, if he chose to exercise it. I think this message requesting additional power is a makeshift for campaign purposes; and I for one do not propose to place in the hands of the President an extension of power for any such purpose. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not propose to place in the hands of the President the power to injure the Eastern railway system of this country and to deprive the employés of that system of their occupation. I do not propose to place in the hands of the Executive this power because I think his course throughout has been one of dissimulation and double-dealing toward Congress and the country.

I do not believe that this "campaign document" will work out the results that it was intended to accomplish. I believe that this whole scheme has fallen flat, and that the common sense of the American people will suggest that the President being already clothed with ample power, should first execute the power he has and see what will be the effect before we give him the additional power which he asks for.

Therefore I shall vote against this measure. I believe that it is simply a game of "bluff," resorted to in the heat and excitement of a political campaign; for it is simply intended by the President as a declaration to the Senate that he will go "one better."

Mr. DALZELL. Ten thousand dollars better.

Mr. BAYNE. Ten thousand dollars better, as my colleague suggests. I do not intend to aid in enacting into a solemn act of Congress any such bill as this affecting our dealings with foreign nations.

What did we do here the other day? We hurried through a Chinese bill—put it through under the whip and spur of the Cabinet minister who is not in the Cabinet. [Laughter.] It was taken over to the Senate and passed there; and then word came that China had not rejected the treaty which had been under consideration by that nation; and now the Democratic party in the Senate and in the House are both in a "stew" with reference to that subject. This suggests the propriety of just deliberation.

I have said how different are the principles and attitude of General Harrison from those of the President in reference to the protection of the rights of our citizens, both at home and abroad.

Now, let me show how differently General Harrison and the President regard the policy of protecting American industries. The whole country knows what the President advocated in his message to Congress at the opening of the present session. He proposed a policy tending rapidly to free trade, and the Mills bill, as I have said, is the exponent and exemplification of that policy.

Now, by way of contrast and for purposes of comparison, I shall reproduce from a speech of General Harrison, delivered at Fort Wayne, Ind., a few days ago, what he thinks should be the policy of our Government. This is what General Harrison said:

GENERAL HARRISON'S ADDRESS.

My friends, I desire to thank you for this cordial demonstration. I thank you, not so much for myself as for the party to which most of us have given the consent of our minds. I am glad to know that the people are moved to a thoughtful consideration of those questions which are this year presented for their determination. Under a popular Government like ours it is of the utmost importance that every man who votes should have some reason for his vote; that every man who attaches himself to this or that political party should intelligently understand both the ideas and purposes of the party to which he belongs. I think it is universally conceded by Democrats as well as by Republicans, that the questions involved in this campaign do have a very direct bearing upon the national prosperity and upon the prosperity and welfare of the individual citizen. I think it is conceded that the result of this election will affect beneficently or injuriously our great manufacturing interests, and will affect, for weal or for woe, the workingmen and the working-women who fill these busy hives of industry. [Applause.]

I want to call your attention to a few general facts and principles; and the first one, the one I never tire of mentioning, the one I deem so important that I do not shun the charge that I am repeating myself, is that the condition of the wage-worker of America is better than that of the wage-worker of any other country in the world. [Applause.] Now, if that be true, it is important that you should each find out why it is so; that each one of you should determine for himself what effect a protective tariff has had and is likely to have upon his wages and prosperity. Does it need to be demonstrated that if we reduce our tariff to a revenue level, if we abolish from it every consideration of protection, more goods will come in from abroad than come in now, and what is the necessary effect? It is the transfer to foreign shops work that you need here; it is to diminish American production and increase English production. It is not worth while to stand upon nice definitions as to free trade. Some think it enough to say that they are not free-traders because they are not in favor of abolishing all customs duties. Let me remind such that the free-trade countries of Europe have not abolished all customs duties.

A better distinction is this: The free-trader believes in levying customs duties without any regard to the effect of those duties upon the wages of our working people or upon the production of our own shops. This, then, is the issue. Take it to your homes. There are many confusing and contradictory statements made in the public press and by public speakers. Ask any of those who assail our protective system whether they do not believe that if their policy is adopted a larger amount of foreign-made goods will come into this country. It is their purpose to increase importation in order to cheapen prices. I think I may safely ask you to consider the question whether this cheapening of prices, which they seem to regard as the highest attainment of statesmanship, is consistent with the rate of wages that our working people enjoy now—whether it will not involve, if we are to have foreign competition without favoring duties, a reduction of American wages to the standard of the wages paid abroad. [Applause.]

Do you believe for one moment that two factories making the same product can be maintained in competition where one pays 33 per cent. more to its workingmen than the other? Is it not certain that wages must be equalized in those competing establishments or the one paying the higher wages must shut down? Here in this city, so important and so prosperous, we have a fine illustration of the accruing advantages of a large factory and shop population. It has made your city prosperous as well as populous, and it has made these outlying Allen County farms vastly more valuable than they otherwise would have been. These interests harmonize. But I only ask you to think upon these questions. Settle them in your own minds, for it is agreed by all that as they shall be settled one way or the other, your interests and those of your families and of this community, and of every other like community in this country, are to be affected favorably or unfavorably.

May I not appeal to you to review these questions, to throw off the shackles of preconceived notions and of party prejudices and consider them in the light of all the information that is accessible to you? If you shall do that I do not doubt that the working people of this country will this November forever settle the question that American customs duties shall by intention, by forethought, have regard to the wages of our working people. [Applause.]

I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to pay my respects to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN]. That gentleman, when I endeavored politely to ask him a question, took occasion to reply rudely, and I wish to make an observation or two respecting him. I ask the Clerk to read a single sentence from the gentleman's speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

The nearer a man approaches a diplomat in form, the nearer he is to a fool; and the nearer he approaches one in substance, the nearer he is to a knave.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it is to be presumed that a gentleman who thus gives a general judgment of the diplomats all over the world has some knowledge of them. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the autobiography of the gentleman from Michigan as given in the Congressional Directory.

Mr. BLAND. I do not see the gentleman from Michigan now in the Hall.

Mr. BAYNE. Well, he ought to be here. I deferred my remarks the other day because he was not here.

Mr. GEAR. He has not leave of absence.

The Clerk read as follows:

J. LOGAN CHIPMAN, of Detroit, was born in Detroit, Mich., June 5, 1830; was educated in the schools of that city and at the University of Michigan; in 1846 was engaged in the Lake Superior region as an explorer for the Montreal Mining Company; in 1854 was admitted to the bar, and in that year aided in the payment of the Chippewas of Lake Superior, and participated in making the treaty of Detroit with the Ottawas and Chippewas of Michigan; in 1853 was assistant clerk of the State House of Representatives of Michigan; in 1856 was elected city attorney of Detroit, and held that position till 1861; in 1863 was elected to the Michigan Legislature; in 1865 was appointed attorney of the police board of Detroit; in 1866 ran for Congress on the Democratic ticket, but was defeated; retained the office of attorney of police till May 1, 1879, when he was elected judge of the superior court of Detroit, to which position he was re-elected at the end of six years, and was elected to the Fiftieth Congress as a Democrat, receiving 17,367 votes, against 15,801 votes for Robinson, Republican, and 876 votes for Frisbie, Prohibitionist.

Mr. BAYNE. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Michigan was himself a diplomat.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent that the same courtesy be extended to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that was extended to his predecessor in this debate—at least to the extent of five minutes.

Mr. McCREARY. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. HITT. I ask that the vote be postponed for five minutes in order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have that much additional time.

Mr. McCREARY. There are one or two gentlemen on this side who desire a short time, and I suggest that by unanimous consent the time for closing debate be extended until half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. HITT. Is the additional time to be divided?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would presume so. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HITT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania so much of the extended time as he desires.

Mr. BAYNE. It will be observed that the gentleman from Michigan was himself a diplomat. He was one of the commissioners who negotiated the treaty with the Ottawas and Chippewas of Michigan. The gentleman was thus enabled, no doubt, to form a conclusion respecting diplomats from a subjective standpoint by an introspection into his own moral and mental operations while negotiating that treaty. He should therefore be quite able to determine to which of the two classes he belongs.

It may be, however, he had not fully determined that all diplomats belong to those two classes until he came to Washington and examined the recent treaty negotiated by the President of the United States. It is perfectly evident a critical examination of that treaty would have enabled him to conclude that diplomats were either knaves or fools. It is perfectly certain that in the negotiation of that treaty somebody was badly fooled, and if I understand the stipulations of that treaty it was the United States. Therefore the gentleman has had an opportunity of forming a conclusion respecting diplomats from an objective point of view as well as from a subjective.

A conclusion thus based on the inner consciousness as well as the external facts which he as a jurist examined, for it will be noted he was a judge, ought to be safe and sound. But unfortunately that conclusion relegates the gentleman himself to one of these classes, and to which class he choose to consign himself he may, for I will not quarrel with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentlemen composing the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and their able associates on the floor of the House, as legislators would be quite equal to the discussion of this bill; but it seems they were not. It seems a telegram was sent to the most distinguished criminal lawyer in the State of New York to come on, and he came in hot haste; and I close with the remark, Mr. Speaker, that the President's case must indeed be bad, his crime against the country must indeed be great, when there was necessity for this able criminal lawyer from the city of New York to come here and defend him. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Well may I say the President needs defense. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has given what he called "specimen cases," out of more than one hundred that occurred during the fishing season of 1886, of outrages committed by the Canadian authorities upon our fishermen. Here are the specimens:

James A. Garfield.—Gloucester, Mass. Threatened, about June 1, 1886, with seizure for having purchased bait in a Canadian harbor.

Eben Dale (schooner).—North Haven, Me.; R. G. Babbidge, master. Not permitted to buy bait, ice, or to trade in any way. Driven out of harbors, and unreasonable restrictions whenever near the land. (From statements of R. G. Babbidge, owner and master, Pulpit Harbor, Me.)

Charles Haskell (schooner).—North Haven, Me.; Daniel Thurston, master. Obliged to leave Gulf of St. Lawrence at considerable loss, not being allowed to buy provisions. (From statements of C. S. Staples, owner, North Haven, Me.)

Willie Parkman (schooner).—North Haven, Me.; William H. Banks, master. Unable to get supplies while in Gulf of St. Lawrence, which necessitated returning home at great loss, with a broken voyage. (From statements of William H. Banks, owner and master, North Haven, Me.)

Nellie M. Snow (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; A. E. Snow, master. Was not allowed to purchase provisions in any Canadian ports, or to refit or land and ship fish, consequently obliged to leave for home with broken trip.

Gertrude Summers (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; N. S. Snow, master. Refused privilege of purchasing provisions, which resulted in injury to voyage.

Charles R. Washington (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Jesse S. Snow, master. Master was informed by collector at Ship Harbor, Cape Breton, that if he bought provisions, even if actually necessary, he would be subject to a fine of $400 for each offense. Refused permission by the collector at Souris, Prince Edward Island, to buy provisions, and was compelled to return home September 10, before the close of the fishing season.

John M. Ball (schooner).—Provincetown, Mass.; N. W. Freeman, master. Driven out of Gulf of St. Lawrence to avoid fine of $400 for landing two men in the port of Malpeque, Prince Edward Island. Was denied all supplies, except wood and water, in same port.

Zephyr (schooner).—Eastport, Me.; Warren Pulk, master. Cleared from Eastport, May 31, 1886, under register for West Isles, New Brunswick, to buy herring. Collector refused to enter vessel, telling captain that if he bought fish, which were plenty at the time, the vessel would be seized. Returned to Eastport, losing about a week, which resulted in considerable loss to owner and crew. (From statements of Guilford Mitchell, owner, Eastport, Me.)

Abdon Keene (schooner).—Bremen, Me.; William C. Keene, master. Was not allowed to ship or land crew at Nova Scotia ports, and owner had to pay for their transportation to Maine. (From statements of William C. Keene, owner and master, Bremen, Me.)

John Nye (schooner).—Swan's Island, Me.; W. L. Joyce, master. After paying entry fees and harbor dues was not allowed to buy provisions at Malpeque, Prince Edward Island, and had to return home for same, making a broken trip.

Nathan Cleaves (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; P. E. Hickman, master. Ran short of provisions, and, not being permitted to buy, left for home with a broken voyage. Customs officer at Port Mulgrave, Nova Scotia, would allow purchase of provisions for homeward passage, but not to continue fishing.

Frank G. Rich (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Charles A. Gorham, master. Not permitted to buy provisions or to lie in Canadian ports over twenty-four hours.

Emma O. Curtis (schooner).—Provincetown, Mass.; Elisha Rich, master. Not allowed to purchase provisions, and therefore obliged to return home.

Pleiades (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; F. W. Snow, master. Driven from harbor within twenty-four hours after entering. Not allowed to ship or discharge men under penalty of $400.

Charles F. Atwood (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Michael Burrows, master. Captain was not permitted to refit vessel or to buy supplies, and when out of food had to return home. Found Canadians disposed to harass him and put him to many inconveniences. Not allowed to land seine on Canadian shore for purpose of repairing same.

May I not fairly say that the protection of the rights of American citizens, both at home and abroad, and the protection of American industries go hand in hand, and that he who will not maintain the one will not maintain the other? [Applause.]

Mr. McCREARY. I will yield now to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO].

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, I indorse with heartiness every word said this morning by the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. And I thank publicly that simple, dignified, honest, and splendid American citizen, Grover Cleveland, for his magnificent message. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, this question transcends that of a mere political one. It is no longer a question of fish dutiable or undutiable. It is not a question of transportation of grain. It is not a railroad or a personal question. It is not a question for peddlers or speculators, but for patriots. It is not a local or sectional question. It is a question which concerns the honor and dignity and the rights of the whole American people. We have been over-kind and generous to our northern neighbors, and they have repaid our kindness by an open, brutal, bullying, and unjustifiable breach of a solemn treaty entered into between our country and Great Britain. The Tory mobs and cowardly bigots of Toronto and other places in Canada have mistaken our generosity for fear of British bluster and assumed power.

Canada, a long line of straggling provinces, peopled by unassimilated and antagonistic races, is ruled by railroads managed by British Tories. Sir John Macdonald, in the plain face of the treaty provisions and the whole history of the case, to placate the bigoted, intolerant Orange faction of the center and please the financially distressed fishing and maritime provinces of the coast and build up, at our expense, the Canadian Pacific Railway on the Pacific coast, in a characteristic British Tory way, inaugurated a policy of Canadian aggression against our fishing and carrying trade. It became fashionable in Canada among the Tory faction to deride and sneer at Americans, and robbing us of our rights was looked upon as a sort of "spoiling the Egyptians."

The Canadian pirate fishing cruisers seemed to think that pulling pinfeathers out of the American eagle was an amusement fraught with no serious consequences. We are peaceable people. The early Jeffersonian statesmen who molded and formed our institutions wanted to avoid foreign entanglements and questions. The American question of rooting our people on the land in happy, prosperous times, and of fairly distributing the result of productive industry among well-fed, well-clothed, happy, intelligent, and contented freemen, was to them the main question. The foolish foppery of bespangled diplomacy, smothered in ornate but meaningless rhetoric, had no charms for them, and we their descendants have little use for the absurd pomp and narrow chicanery of a system that may have befitted the days when mankind were divided into seigneurs and serfs, and nations communicated by stage-coaches and lumbering craft moved by fitful winds.

European nations, mistaking our disuse to a great extent of this system, have ignorantly concluded, seemingly, that we would be easy victims to foreign arrogance and infringement of our rights.

This to them is a fatal mistake. The United States are so powerful, unassailable, and so conscious of their strength that they are tolerant of petty annoyances to a degree.

But let Canada and England take warning that the first step beyond the dead-line of what is right and just, and our people will rise as one man, irresistible in their strength and fury, and crush the intruder.

I regret my time is short, and therefore I shall be obliged to notice only one or two features of the question. I had hoped to have had time to review the merits of this bill. I was pained to see during this debate gentlemen on the other side of the House address themselves to a portion of American citizens, as if they were influenced by reasons which are not applicable to the great mass of the people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, that portion of our fellow-citizens who were born in Ireland, as well as that portion who are descended from those who were born in Ireland, view American questions through distinctively American eyes to be reviewed in minds dominated solely by American ideas; and their only concern in public action, as citizens of the great Republic, is as to how they can best conserve her prosperity, rights, and dignity. Like other American citizens they differ in their views of public questions and are to be found in all leading political parties. They are intensely America and of America. They are not aliens; they are children of our common country. It is, therefore, a direct imputation, not only upon the intelligence, but upon the patriotism of these people in thus selecting them as a special audience when gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber instead of addressing to them the ordinary arguments affecting the reason and conscience of the great mass of the American people, made up of almost every race, select them as a distinct and un-American people, so low in intelligence, so wanting in discrimination, that red fire and stage thunder are sufficient to carry conviction to their minds and influence their political action; that playing with the tail of a lion stuffed with straw, and provided with a patent squeak in his abdominal recesses, is to them equal to seizing the live, genuine animal by his cruel jaws and making him disgorge his prey.

That blare, bluster, tin helmets, sham oppositions, and frothy declamation are captivating to these our fellow-citizens and fellow-Americans. That fulsome eulogy during the heat of a Presidential campaign from lips that heretofore have "coined slander like a mint" on a people who need no defense and whose ears can not be tickled by transparent flattery can not be detected from genuine friendship. They need no defense, for are not their names glowing on our pages in field and forum, in arts, sciences, and industries from the early settlements of America to the day the clods fell in yonder cemetery on the bier of the General of our armies. They need no advertisement of special friendship, for in the struggle in the old land there are no Democrats or Republicans in this land, all Americans being in sympathy with those heroic efforts for liberty.

Mr. Speaker, it would be well for gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, and members of the same party outside of it, to remember somewhat the history of these our fellow-citizens in their native land. There are no people who come to this country who are more intensely American than are our citizens of Irish birth or descent. For seven hundred years they have maintained a continuous contest unequaled either in classical or modern annals for the right of self-government and for the boon of liberty. Hence, to every land to which they have been driven, as well as in this country, they are intensely and instinctively democratic-republican in the universal sense. For seven hundred long years they have been the unfortunate victims of an alien paternal government, and of caste, class, and sect; and hence, in the United States, as in all other lands in which they have found refuge, they are the uncompromising and unyielding opponents of a centralized paternal government and the staunch advocates of a local self-government, and in our land have ever favored the cardinal home-rule doctrine of our federal system.

For over seven hundred years they have felt the cruel injustice of monopoly in lands, trade, and in the right to rule, and hence in this as in all other countries, while almost unanimously opposed to State socialism and centralization of the governing power, they are the unyielding enemies of monopoly, trusts, combinations, land-grabbing, and all injustices of the few against the many; and in such a contest as is now being waged here in the United States between the plutocracy and the democracy it is, sir, not at all surprising to the intelligent observer who understands the history of this portion of our fellow-citizens to find that a large and overwhelming majority of them have ranged themselves with the masses of the people against monopoly. [Applause.] They are an exceedingly acute and intelligent people, and quick and discerning, as is known universally, and they may be relied upon to resent the silly imputations upon their good sense and judgment shown in these now frantic partisan appeals.

Sir, the action of the President of the United States, in my opinion, is not only wise, firm, statesmanlike, and patriotic, but it has been absolutely consistent. After the passage of the impotent, localized, and misleading act of 1887 it was right that we should negotiate with Great Britain, so that our relations with Canada might be placed upon a pacific, permanent, and honorable basis. The act of 1887, against which I voted for the stronger act of the majority of this House, developed the issue to a contention about the duty on fish, and our so-called retaliation was only calculated to close out competition for the wealthy owners of New England fishing fleets. It was a great misfortune that the commission that dealt with this question, and which sat in this city, should have as the British representative on it a man who had forfeited the esteem, confidence, and respect of the great portion of the American people, as well as millions of his own countrymen, a man whose course in his own land as politician and statesman had been such that he rightfully merited the condemnation of millions of our people. Among no small number of our citizens his appointment by the British Tories was regarded as an open defiance and contempt of American public opinion on contemporaneous British politics.

The appointment of that gentleman on the commission as the British representative, while not excusing the blind partisanship of a Senate that would neither amend nor judicially consider, helped no little to becloud the negotiations. This gentleman, from the day he landed on our shores, among a law-abiding and peaceful people, was followed by a cordon of detectives in a land where he was in less danger than in Great Britain, and cast suspicion by his conduct on our good faith and desire for peace as well as the honesty and friendly nature of his own intentions.

But, sir, in the limited time allotted to me I can not pursue this subject further. My distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has read the boastful, bombastic British brag of the London Standard. I want to say a word in that connection.

Let Lord Salisbury and the English Tories and the London Standard indulge in their boastful threats and insinuations as to our naval weakness, and I will say to them in response that the modern ironclads of England, such ships as the Inflexible and the Thunderer, would be as impotent on our coasts and harbors as wash-tubs armed with fire-crackers. [Laughter.] The good God who made the harbors and the unexcelled officers of our Navy will make the Tories, if it be necessary, regret they ever saw the shores of Sandy Hook. And Yankee crews on American-built cruisers will strew the waters with the wrecks of British commerce, and the day a British gun knocks the first brick from a house in New York or Boston or anywhere on our shores will usher in the destruction of the whole monstrous, greedy British Empire, presage a free flag for India, Ireland, Canada, and Australia, a cessation of territorial stealing in Venezuela and Africa, and means financial liberation from British despotism and damnable selfishness and greed to Egypt and Turkey and the innumerable victims of her infamous commercial piracy. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCREARY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. This, Mr. Speaker, has been in many respects the most remarkable debate——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, as I wish to inquire how much time is due to this side of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLOUNT in the chair). Ten minutes' additional time was granted by unanimous consent, which carried the time up to ten minutes past 4 o'clock. Since then an additional request for unanimous consent has fixed the time for the vote at half past 4 o'clock. The Chair will endeavor as far as possible to divide the time equally.

The Chair will state that the time is now running.

Mr. CANNON. I only wanted to know whether a portion of that time was not due to this side, in addition to the six minutes yet remaining.

Mr. MCCREARY. I will see the gentleman and confer with him while this debate is in progress.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when interrupted, this has been in many respects the most extraordinary debate I have ever heard in Congress. The country is threatened with a disturbance on the Canadian border that bodes it no good. A measure was adopted during the last Congress which, if enforced, by way of retaliation, would have inflicted upon ourselves as much injury as we would have inflicted upon our antagonists. The President, hesitating to exercise the authority which would result in so little good to ourselves and so little punishment to Canada, has gone patriotically to work for the purpose of negotiating a treaty to settle the difference between the countries and secure for American citizens the rights which inherently belong to them and have been recognized by treaty stipulations since almost the first of the century.

Gentlemen on the other side have talked of partisanship in connection with this matter. When I look to the Senate, Mr. Speaker, the co-ordinate treaty-making branch of the Government, I find that all precedents were violated, and this audacious President who had dared work for honorable peace by treaty, was to have a public castigation administered to him by an indignant Senate. The doors were thrown open contrary to custom, and the country invited to witness the partisan chastisement to be given; the public were invited that outside influences might have their effect in settling our difficulties, with a view to obtaining a partisan triumph. But the public parade did not accomplish the object for which it was intended. True, the treaty was defeated, but the President has come forward with that patriotism and boldness which characterize him, and said, "You have defeated the treaty; you have prevented the possibility of a treaty." You have refused to give our people their rights and peace by treaty. Now, if you mean what you say, go forward and give that kind of retaliation which injures the enemy and not your own people. [Applause.]

That great message of the President on retaliation came to this House filled with wisdom and patriotism, profound and lofty, and is before us for consideration. [Applause.] Strange to relate, every gentleman who has arisen on the other side to debate it has carped and criticised and condemned that message, but when the time for voting comes they are forced to fall down and truckle after the President in this American measure. We do not care whether you are forced to your duty by patriotism, public sentiment, or by the action of the President, so you are brought to it.

Now, gentlemen have laid stress upon the fact that the President failed to enforce the retaliatory measure that was put upon the statute-books by the last Congress. To have done so would not have reached the evil. It would have left the Canadian Government and the Canadian people to ship through our borders annually between forty and fifty million dollars' worth of their products in bond without paying duty and without any power to stop them. The authority to stop this was not given by the act of 1887. That is the power that the President asks to-day, and that is the power that he will get, the opposition on the other side and the majority of the Senate to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.]

If I had the poor opinion of this movement that gentlemen on the other side profess, I could not be forced to support the bill. One, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], calls it "clap-trap," but acknowledges his fondness for "clap-trap" by announcing he will have to vote for it. Another says it is an effort to "humbug," but confesses it is a humbug he has not the courage to resist. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] complains at it volubly, but toward the close of his speech says pathetically that he thinks he has spied the American eagle flying in that direction, and he has determined to support the bill rather than leave the bird. A score or more of gentlemen on the other side have poured forth their vials of wrath on the President and his retaliatory message, and not half a dozen will be bold enough to vote against it.

We want no war. We would much prefer peace. We trust the relations between Canada and the United States will be amicable. But we believe that honorable peace will most surely be maintained by withdrawing from Canada those privileges of shipment and commerce she has heretofore enjoyed. But at whatever of cost is necessary we are resolved that a Democratic administration will maintain, as did Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and Polk, the dignity of our Government and the rights of our people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. I have a strong interest, representing as I do one of the border Congressional districts, in calling attention to some of the commercial features involved in this retaliation bill and the message, and to that which relates more particularly to our lake commerce. I took occasion to-day to interrupt the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] in one statement that he had made, as to whether Canada would not have the advantage if the provisions of the second section of the bill were carried out by the President.

Now, I understand that all powers granted in the first and all of this second section are discretionary with the President, and I am very glad it is so, for few statesmen can understand the Northern commerce and its needs and the commerce of the Northwest better than Mr. Cleveland. He has seen its ebb and flow all his life. He has lived in a city that is the gateway of all the Northwestern commerce, the city of Buffalo. Now, if this bill should become law and the President regarded it as mandatory upon him to carry out the second section of the bill, the first and most dangerous movement in retaliation that would be made upon the part of Canada would turn on the fact that all commerce that comes out of Lake Superior has to pass partially over Canadian waters. All that commerce could be crippled in an hour.

We could in the course of a year, probably, manage to improve the Middle Neebish, which is a part of the proposed Hay Lake channel, so as to deepen it sufficiently for vessels drawing 12 to 14 feet to pass through; otherwise transportation of all the Northwestern grain, all the upward coal, and all the downward lumber via the Lake Superior water route would have to stop. And this is only one of the canals involved in the contemplated retaliation. What a predicament our people would be in should it be discovered that part of our St. Clair Flats Canal, and all of the Limekiln Crossing near Detroit are in Canadian waters? Probably our commerce would be better off without the use of the St. Lawrence canals. I do not care if the Canadians did shut up the Welland. I think that the great preponderance of trade that comes into New England could well escape that route and be transported cheaper by an enlarged Erie Canal.

When you come to the railroad traffic and "transit in bond" of all our winter-carried products in the Northwest, then Canada has the key in her hand. She has the lock, too, to the local Northwest. More than that; if the usual four months of winter transit, through any proclamation or act of the President, is stopped, every farmer in the Northwest as far south as Northern Kansas will pay 5 to 10 cents a bushel out of the proceeds of his grain as demanded for freight on more southern trunk-lines. There is no help for that shrinkage in the value of his grain crop.

The Canadian Pacific Railroad is a British railroad. It is really owned by Great Britain. It is put in trust by British capitalists simply in Canadian hands. It is an imperial political road that all the Tory Government officials of Great Britain, all the greater Britain statesmen, all the jingo politicians of England, have asked for for years. There are $140,000,000 British and Canadian funds in that road. There are $50,000,000 of like funds in the Intercolonial road. These roads combined is the line that is to be the imperial route from India to England. This bill, I say, practically, if carried out, as is demanded, and which is declared to be asked for by public sentiment, gives to England and Canada all they desire. Cutting off Canada's southern railway connections in the States they care little about. For British gold, British honor, and British credit will reimburse Canada for any temporary loss. If this bill is construed as mandatory it makes one road from Port Moody to St. Johns and Halifax independent and profitable, and thereby controlling the trans-continental trade from one ocean to the other. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY].

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill authorizing the President, at his discretion, to suspend the operation of all laws which allow Canada to transport across the territory of the United States, free of duty, what her people may import from or export to foreign countries, is a measure having no other purpose than that of retaliating upon Canada for what we claim to be her wrong-doings respecting our fisheries interests.

Equally retaliatory is that part of the bill which imposes a tax upon the tonnage of foreign vessels using the Sault Ste. Marie or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and retaliatory, too, is the provision which authorizes the President, in a given contingency, by proclamation, to prohibit the use of either of these canals to all foreign vessels.

As a mere retaliatory measure the pending bill is all that the friends of a retaliatory policy could desire. But, sir, upon a careful reading of the bill it will be seen that the tonnage tax for which it provides is to be levied upon all foreign vessels and their cargoes which may pass through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and against all foreign vessels these canals may be closed whenever the President shall be satisfied that the Canadian Government discriminates against the interests of American citizens in the use of the Welland Canal, the Chambly Canal, or the St. Lawrence River canals.

Sir, to my mind these features of the bill do more than retaliate against the interests of Great Britain and Canada. To retaliate against these two countries by charging their vessel-owners for the use of our canals, or to prohibit their use to all British subjects is right; but to go beyond this, and impose a tax upon the tonnage of vessels owned in countries other than Great Britain or Canada, or to close these two great water ways to countries with whom we have no differences would be, in my judgment, wrong. With Canada, or speaking more exactly, with Great Britain, we have a dispute, but with all other countries, fortunately, we have none. To retaliate against British interests we feel that there is just cause, but to harm in the slightest degree the interests of any country with which our relations are entirely friendly we have no cause at all.

The bill, in the particular under discussion, will, in case it becomes a law, place the United States in a position which she ought not to occupy. If we enact this bill into a law we, in effect, say to the world that because of a dispute between us and our Canadian neighbors respecting fishery rights, no vessels except those owned by our own citizens shall pass through either of our canals connecting the northern lakes. Sir, we should hesitate long before we make such a declaration. and it ought not to be made at all unless the situation be such as to imperatively demand it. If my reading of this bill be correct, there is, to my mind, a necessity for amending it so as to limit the retaliatory features to British interests, and so they will operate against none other.

The bill as it now stands may offend those whom we wish to be our friends, and as a precedent it may give us trouble in the future. If there be any sufficient reason why Germany, or France, or any other friendly power should pay a tonnage tax upon their vessels, should they have occasion to pass through our lake canals, or be excluded altogether from their use, it is to be hoped that my distinguished friend from Kentucky in charge of the bill [Mr. McCREARY] will state it to the House so that all the friends of a retaliatory policy may be united in supporting this measure.

If there be no good reason for closing these canals against foreign countries other than Great Britain and Canada, or for the imposition of a tonnage tax upon vessels not owned or controlled by British subjects, I shall at the proper time, if permitted, offer an amendment to the bill striking out, in line 9 of section 2, the words "foreign vessels," and insert the words "vessel owned in whole or in part by British subjects," and also by striking out the word "foreign" where it occurs in section 2, lines 15 and 16.

Mr. Speaker, we hear it said that all the power needful in the present exigency has been conferred upon the President by existing law. Sir, either the gentlemen who assert this are mistaken or my understanding of the act of March 3, 1887, is greatly at fault. This act simply confers power upon the President in given cases, to deny British vessels entrance into our waters and to deny entry into the United States of fish or other products or goods from the Canadian Dominion.

It will be seen, therefore, that under the act of March 3, 1887, there is no power to levy a tonnage tax upon British vessels passing through our lake canals or to deny to British subjects the use of these canals in case the Dominion Government discriminates against our people in the use of either of the three Canadian canals. In my judgment the situation does not necessitate a resort to extreme measures.

To deny British vessels entrance into our waters, or to our ports, would be an act little, if any, short of a declaration of war, and to a war between the United States and Great Britain every interest we have, and they have, is opposed. Better by far that before we open our guns upon our Canadian neighbors we first exhaust all peaceful measures to secure to our fishermen their rights. When we have done this, and not before, it will be time to talk about closing our ports against British vessels.

That part of the act of March 3, 1887, which provides a peaceful method for adjusting existing differences with Great Britain and Canada limits the power of the President to excluding all Canadian products and goods from the United States. Sir, if it be becoming in our Government to employ one peaceful method in settling a dispute between it and a foreign power, it is equally becoming in it to employ others, if they be not dishonorable.

While the President under existing law may exclude Canadian products from the United States, would it not be wise in us to go a step further and give him the power to exact from the Canadian people pay for the use of our water ways, or to deny them their use, and if this be wise, why does the Republican side of the House speak only in fault-finding words when discussing the subject? Is it an answer to the President's message recommending what the pending bill proposes to say that the President has the power under the act of 1887 to prevent British vessels from entering our waters or our ports, and that hitherto this power has been unused? No one of the gentlemen who have taken part in this debate had the boldness to demand that our ports be closed to British ships.

Shall the President, at this time, to-day, this hour proclaim that no British vessel shall enter our waters or our ports; and for the sole reason that Congress near two years ago authorized the President to so do if, in his judgment, he thought it best? Is war with Great Britain a demand of the Republican party? Come, gentlemen of the opposition, let us hear from you on this point. Tell the House and the country whether or not, in case your party is voted into power at the coming election, that on and after the 4th of March next all British vessels will be denied entrance into the waters of the United States.

Why, sir, it is known of all men that at or about the time the act of March 3, 1887, was passed, negotiations were pending between our Government and that of Great Britain and Canada for an amicable adjustment of these disputed fishery rights. It may be fairly assumed that arrangements for treating upon this subject were perfecting at the time, if not before this act was passed. Would it have been politic in the President to have put an end to these negotiations and issued his proclamation closing our ports against the entrance of all vessels carrying the British flag? Had he done so he would have been condemned and upbraided from one end of this country to the other.

In continuing the negotiations, and particularly in reaching a result which at the time was supposed to be satisfactory to each of the three Governments, instead of exercising the power with which he had been invested to suspend all intercourse by water, if not by land, between the United States and Great Britain and Canada, he deserves and has, I verily believe, the good opinion of all except the leaders and politicians in the Republican party.

That the treaty made between these three Governments adjusting all differences respecting the fisheries did not become operative is not the fault of the President, nor is it the fault of Great Britain, nor of the Dominion of Canada. Great Britain, according to my understanding, still stands by her agreement, the Canadian Government still stands by its agreement, and both of these high contracting parties are willing that what they and our Government did shall be a binding compact between the three countries.

The entire blame for the failure of the treaty, and as a consequence the situation which now confronts us, is upon the few gentlemen who for the time being control the action of the Senate of the United States. Sir, it is a fact deserving particular notice that these fishery troubles are still upon our hands because the Republican Senate was unwilling that they should be settled by a Democratic administration. Every Republican Senator present voted to reject the treaty, and in so voting he gave the country to understand that its rejection was a party necessity.

The Republican Senators had full power to amend the treaty and make it conform to their views, but they dismissed it, seemingly without a why or a wherefore, and now appear greatly pleased that the rights of our fishermen are still a subject for dispute and to be settled, if at all, upon terms to be dictated by Republican politicians, or else at the point of the bayonet and amid the rattle and roar of musketry and cannon.

If the Republican leaders are to have the exclusive charge of our fishermen and their rights they must show more purpose in adjusting their troubles than they have hitherto done in settling their own disputes about tariff legislation or determining whether they will do something or do nothing with the tariff bill which, seven weeks ago, this House sent to the Senate, and which, as early as April last, Senators well understood and then knew would sooner or later be upon their desks for their action—not after, but before the November election. Fondly is it to be hoped that our fishermen will fare better at the hands of Republican politicians than have the tax-burdened people of our country.

But, sir, the treaty made by the present Administration, and which the Senate rejected by a strict party vote, would, had it been ratified, put at rest, perhaps for all coming time, the fishery disputes which for so many years have been so disturbing to many of our people. Without discussing the merits of the treaty, or the question as to whether it was an advantageous or disadvantageous agreement upon our part and for our people, the public mind will not be easily persuaded to believe that President Cleveland would give to it his approval unless it secured to American citizens their just rights.

Outside of the Republican party the treaty appears to be in great favor, but inside of that party opinions differ as widely about the fishery questions as they do about making food and clothing and shelter dear, and whisky, beer, and tobacco cheap. The time which has been allotted to me in this debate does not permit my discussing at great length this branch of the subject. We dismiss it, therefore, full of the belief that our fisheries rights will not be adjusted at any future time more satisfactorily to American interests than they were in the treaty recently rejected by the Republican Senate.

Mr. Speaker, while I shall vote for the bill as it now stands, it would have a still warmer support at my hands if it gave to the President the power to negotiate with Great Britain and Canada for the annexation of the British dominions in North America to the United States.

Firm and immovable in the belief that this is the true American policy, I shall, if able to secure the attention of the House, offer to further amend the bill by adding the following section:

SEC. 4. In case the United States, Great Britain, and Canada further negotiate to adjust the existing differences between the said countries, the President be, and hereby is, directed to negotiate, at the same time, for the annexation of the British dominions in North America to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, no man, whether he be a citizen of the United States or owes his allegiance to Great Britain or Canada, can look upon a map of the American continent and rid himself of the thought that the United States and the British dominions ought to be one country, under one government and one flag, and the people thereof united in indissoluble bonds to promote a common interest and achieve a common destiny.

In the brief time at my disposal this question can not be elaborately presented, and therefore I will have to be content, at this time, with a very few words. The reasons, sir, for urging that these two countries be made one are so many and convincing and so obvious that the mere statement of the proposition is the strongest and best argument in its support.

Will it be said that while the United States no doubt favors annexation, surely Great Britain and Canada will oppose it?

Who is authorized to so speak? Unless negotiations are opened for annexation, the two countries must be forever separate and apart. We will never know the mind of Great Britain or Canada upon this subject unless we make inquiry. It is for us, not them, to make the advance. If we favor annexation, it is not likely that any better opportunity will be presented to make the declaration than now, and for negotiations with them the pending bill, if amended, will surely open the way. No matter if the subject be a delicate one to broach, or that success may appear to be improbable, still a move in that direction ought to be made, and made here and now.

Less than one hundred years ago the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi River were the eastern and western boundaries of the Republic. To-day the waters of another ocean are washing our western borders. Had our fathers been reared in a stand-still school the Republic at this hour would be a poor, puny, and pitiful power among the nations of the world. No, sir, the men who fought for seven long and weary years in the Revolutionary struggle for the independence of themselves and their posterity were no stand-stills; nor did the men who succeeded them and preceded us in the up-building of this great Government of ours pursue a do-nothing policy.

Jefferson, in acquiring Louisiana from France, showed his profound understanding of a true American policy. By this wise and masterly achievement French rule over a part of our continent ceased. Out of the territory acquired, nine powerful and populous States have been formed, and enough area is left to form nine more.

The history of that period tells us that Jefferson was the first to move, the first to set on foot the negotiations. Monroe had well in mind the American policy when he peacefully released the hold Spain had upon our continent and made what is now the State of Florida a part of our territorial possessions, yet he had to take the advance in negotiating. We would do well if we thought oftener and more than we do of what is known in our history as the Monroe doctrine.

Still later, sir, the administration of President Polk gave to the country unmistakable proof that it knew the right policy for us to pursue respecting contiguous territory under the control of a foreign power. Under the rule of this far-seeing Executive the independent Republic of Texas was annexed to the United States, and in the negotiations which secured this great empire our Government moved first. And later we acquired California and New Mexico; yet, sir, the policy which secured these valuable possessions was not of the stand-still and do-nothing kind. Alaska we acquired under the administration of President Johnson, but we should keep in mind that it was the United States who first proposed to buy and not Russia who first offered to sell.

Wise, indeed, sir, was the policy of our fathers in adding so largely to our territorial area, and were they with us to-day they would tell us that they did their part, and that now and here we ought to do ours, to the end that the flag of the Republic may peacefully wave over every part and parcel of the North American continent. Not in my day, nor in the day of any now before me, but surely in the time of the youngest among the living, the British possessions upon our northern boundary and what is now the Republic of Mexico will be States in the Federal Union and be governed by laws enacted at this Capitol.

Let the acquisition of Mexico be the work of those who are to come after us. Upon the annexation of the British dominions I would have the mind of the present generation intent. When, if not now, shall the negotiations commence? Authorize them by amending the pending bill, and the first step is taken.

Shall this be done now, or will we allow the opportunity now presented to pass unimproved?

My judgment, Mr. Speaker, upon any public question is of little or no value, and upon the question before us it is possibly, if not probably, more than ever at fault; yet such as it is, and for whatever it be worth, it is strong and abides in the conviction that the administration which adds the British dominions on this continent to our territorial possessions will be remembered in love and in pride by hundreds of millions of people long after its other achievements have faded or gone from human memory.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, rose.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] be allowed ten minutes, the session to be extended for that period.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LEE. I do not wish to be discourteous, but do I understand that it is proposed that the session of to-day shall be extended beyond the hour fixed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman from Illinois is that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] be allowed ten minutes, and that the session be extended. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCREARY. I do not object, if it is done with the understanding that the session will be extended until the vote is taken.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman to propose that the session of to-day shall be extended until the vote is taken on the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the request as modified by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, until within an hour it had not occurred to me to offer any observations upon the pending proposition. I state this in justice to myself, as I have not had the time to give this subject the careful examination that it merits. But, sir, there are some things which appeal to the intelligence of every citizen; there are some propositions that have come into the debate this morning from able and eloquent sources, upon which every American citizen ought to be prepared to say a word. I am going to vote for this bill. I do not know but I may regret it, but I will take the chances, on the principle, chiefly, that in order to get an inch out of the present Executive we have got to lay several ells upon his back. That is my chief reason. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has made a sharp issue between the two sides of this Chamber to-day. It is this: Has the President of the United States, in assuming his present attitude towards the country, acted honestly with the American people? My eloquent friend says "no one here charges the President with dishonesty." I do, Mr. Speaker, when he sends in the message that he has sent, claiming to be acting as a patriot in connection with this great subject. Why do I so charge him? Becauae from the standpoint of the great position that he holds he is trifling with the American people. The White House is converted into a Democratic headquarters or document-room to catch the Irish vote. What is the issue?

Fifteen thousand fishermen of this country, representing over 60,000 Americans dependent upon them or connected with them, have been outraged almost in the very presence of the President of the United States, and have been repeatedly denied time-honored rights. What did these outraged citizens of the United States ask for? Simply that as they were treated by a foreign government so should their own Government treat the people that outraged them. That is what they ask, and nothing more.

The American Congress with but one dissenting voice, and with a quick ear to the appeal of their fellow-citizens, responded on the 3d day of March, 1887, and directed the President to do the very thing that these injured American fishermen and American honor demanded—that is, to deny to Canadian fishermen the same rights that the Canadian Government denied to American fishermen. In the presence of insults such as have never before been offered to the American flag by a foreign power the head of this nation, with this ample power in his hands, stood paralyzed.

In the presence of the appeal of an aroused nation, expressed in this Hall, he stood silent and impotent. Press, people, every self-respecting voice of this nation, cried out against the outrage, and we commanded him to act. Those that now cry out in this Hall so eloquently in behalf of American labor and American rights, and hurl with thundering intonations invectives against the British flag, then sneered at the "codfish quarrels" on the Atlantic coast. "It was but a little question of codfish," they said, "and shall we involve 60,000,000 people in trouble on that account?" Now, forsooth, when a great national political conflict is impending, you and the President jump in with your sleeves rolled up, bellowing practically for war. It will not do. Even my gifted and esteemed friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] with all his eloquence can not pull the lion's skin over the Democratic candidate and hide the long ears that will protrude. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He is the "great moral type of American citizenship," says the gentleman from New York. Then God have mercy on my country! Ah, I will not touch upon that "moral type;" I never have done so. The curtain which has here been drawn so carefully around that "moral type" by eloquent and gifted men I will not raise my hand to touch. I will be kind. But I challenge you, and each of you, to tear down every curtain around the life of the Republican candidate, Benjamin Harrison! [Applause on the Republican side.] Do not spare any transaction of his life, private or public. Away with the curtain! He stands before you; shatter one defending column, if you can! [Renewed applause.]

Grover Cleveland may be the Democratic type of American morals and American citizenship, but as for us, we would not point the young men of America to him as a model to follow. The man who, now bursting for war, stood a shivering coward behind a substitute when there was reason for battle [applause on the Republican side] need not be cited to us as the model for American youth——

Mr. MCMILLIN (while Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, was speaking). Did you vote for Blaine in the last Presidential contest? I want to know whether you voted for Blaine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa (not hearing Mr. MCMILLIN). But instead of holding up Grover Cleveland as the model of American citizenship, we would burn into the brain of the young men of America a true type, and point them to Benjamin Harrison, who, with drawn blade, undaunted heart, and flashing eye, dashed into the thickest of the conflict for American honor and American life. That is the model that sixty millions of people are going to adopt in November. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, before the debate proceeds further, that the hour of adjournment for to-day has been extended until the vote shall be concluded.

Mr. MCCREARY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRYCE].

Mr. BRYCE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the pros and cons of this fishery question, and the interpretation of the twenty-ninth article in particular, have been too fully discussed to justify my repeating them. I will only say that I take my stand with the President in his construction of this article. And who is it that criticises his action? The same party who refused to amend the treaty when it was in their power to make it conform to their views.

Look at the magnificent speech of the gentleman from Illinois, whose brilliancy and information justly entitle him to be considered as the spokesman of his own side. See its inconsistency. In prophesying the dangers of this bill Mr. HITT says:

As a practical fact, the interruption of the traffic in bond would probably affect our people more seriously and more injuriously than anything that has transpired in the fishing difficulty since the beginning.

And yet I am told that in spite of holding such an opinion he is going to vote for the bill. In short, he will vote for a measure which he avers would injure our people more seriously than anything that has transpired in the fishing difficulty since the beginning.

Continuing, he says:

And as to punishing an enemy, while it might trouble many persons in Canada, it would play directly into the hands and promote the purposes of the body of men who now rule Canada.

Canada is ruled by a body of able men, under a system which has enabled the Tory party, with concentrated English influence, to keep Sir John Macdonald in power now these many years.

And yet I am informed that along with his party he will vote for this measure—a measure that will play directly into the hands and promote the purposes of a body of men who now rule Canada. In short, he will vote to further the "concentrated English influence," and to give the Tory party under Sir John Macdonald a new lease of power.

Again he says:

Stop transit in bond now coming across the United States, turn it all over that intercolonial road to the sea, and it will become a great trunk line, its trains loaded with the commerce of Central Canada.

Later on he says:

Nor do I see the wisdom of promoting the general policy of the Tory government.

But then why will he vote to promote the policy of this Tory government if he does not see the wisdom of so doing?

"Is the President thinking of fishermen or fishing for votes?" he asks again. It seems to me it does not require much fishing to get votes on the Republican side of the stream.

Turning also to the speech of another distinguished gentleman from the same State, I read:

If Cleveland's policy is enacted into law, it will indeed prove a tragedy.

But the same gentleman when asked yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] confessed that he was going to vote for the bill—to vote for a measure that in his opinion would prove a tragedy.

In another place he says:

The Ethiopian can not change his skin, nor the leopard his spots.

But it seems the Republicans can change their convictions, which is worse. Who is it that turns the double somersault he attributes to the President? Who is it that cries "Gore, gore, gore!" which he attributes to Mr. SCOTT? With bombastic gestures and heroic words, with clash of arms and blaze of trumpets, with blood-curdling denunciations and martial music, the Republican party, led by the gentleman from Illinois, marches like the French king up the hill only to walk down again, crying, in the words of the small boy he has quoted, "Paid, if the blamed thing only sticks."

"Why this posturing?" the same gentleman goes on to ask. Why this posturing, indeed? But who is it that is posturing and beating gongs? as he accuses us of doing. Who is it that is adopting the Chinese policy of terrifying the enemy by noise? Certainly not the Democrats. We will stick to our colors, whether it pays or not.

Does principle go for nothing? For a party to criticise and abuse, to villify and ridicule a measure they intend to vote for marks, in my opinion, an infamy so profound, a damnation so deep, that the hand of resurrection will never drag it forth.

Now, sir, I have not picked out these utterances in a captious spirit, but simply to show the inconsistency of the only objectors to this bill. If they believe as they talk, let them have the courage of their convictions and vote against it.

But they will not vote against it. Hence they will prove that they do not believe in the danger of granting the President the power he asks for.

But votes or no votes, let it never be said that the President appealed in vain to his country; though let it be recorded in deep-cut letters on the grave-stone of the Republican party, that when they gave that power they gave it grudgingly and only because to refuse it they did not dare.

Mr. MCCREARY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH].

Mr. CARUTH.

A government does but half its duty when it protects its citizens at home and permits them to be imposed upon and humiliated by the unfair and overreaching disposition of other nations.—Grover Cleveland.

Mr. Speaker, in the limited time at my disposal I shall not attempt to consider the sections of the various treaties which bear upon our relations with Great Britain, nor to argue the legal effect of the proposed retaliatory measure. I am satisfied that the President of the United States, with the aid of his legal advisers, has given the subject matter, as was his duty, thoughtful and patriotic consideration. I am convinced that the result of that consideration, as announced in his message of the 23d of August last, will bear any scrutiny which may be given it by the civilized world, and that in demanding of this body additional legislation the President desired to be so situated that if he could not exact "an eye for an eye" or "a tooth for a tooth" he might at least be empowered to deny to the Dominion of Canada privileges heretofore enjoyed by its citizens of at least equal value with the rights denied our people by that government. The President well expresses it when he says:

The policy of national retaliation manifestly embraces the infliction of the greatest harm upon those who have injured us, with the least possible damage to ourselves. There is also an evident propriety, as well as an invitation to moral support, found in visiting upon the offending party the same measure or kind of treatment of which we complain, and as far as possible within the same lines.

It is well known that the claim of Great Britain to regulate our rights to fish and enter the various bays, inlets, and creeks surrounding her American provinces dates from the year 1818 to this hour, and it is known, too, that from the time of the treaty of peace, at the close of the Revolution, whereby the independence of these States was acknowledged, the citizens of this country were as unmolested and undisturbed when fishing in Canadian waters as were the residents of Her Majesty's Dominion of Canada.

It is known, too, from the evidence elicited, that for many years the wrongs complained of were committed against our fishermen and their vessels, so as to evince an unneighborly and unfriendly spirit. I know that this irritation and these injuries continued under Republican administration unchecked, even whilst "the uncrowned king," "the idol of his party," the "plumed knight," was Secretary of State, and shaped the foreign policy of the Government [applause on the Democratic side]; nor was any demand for reparation for any of these injuries made until the year 1886, during the present Democratic Administration. Gentlemen upon the other side say that Congress, by the act of 1887, gave the President the power to redress the wrongs by retaliation.

We are told in effect that it was "a sharp sword placed in his hands, but his fingers trembled and could not grasp the hilt, and his coward arm refused to draw it from its scabbard," and that "for eighteen months it hung unused at his side." Well did those whose deceptive tongues utter the charge know that for two years negotiations were pending between the powers looking to a friendly settlement of these disputes, and that to resort under such circumstances to harsh measures would, in the eyes of the civilized world, have been almost as inexcusable as for a soldier to fire upon the bearer of a flag of truce or a general to order an attack during the period of an armistice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Well did the gentlemen upon the other side know that the President has asked that full powers of retaliation be given him by the Forty-ninth Congress, and that the Democratic Committee on Foreign Affairs had reported to the House a bill which conferred the power desired, and that in lieu thereof there had been enacted a measure, born in a Republican Senate, which, if a sword, was a two-edged weapon, as liable to cut or kill him who wielded it as the person against whom it was drawn. I see no evidence of disagreement among the members of the committee under whose auspices this measure is brought into the House. I find here no expression of the views of a minority. It is a unanimous report, and this is proof sufficient that a necessity for this measure exists, and that full power has not heretofore been given to the President of the United States to protect American rights or to defend American honor.

We are told that this measure is "a sledge-hammer to be used to crush a fly." The Republican gentleman who uttered this sentiment comes from a State more interested in this subject than any other in the Federal Union—the old Bay State. Let his people know that when he spoke of the wrongs done a large, industrious, and useful class of citizens, he compared their wrongs to an insect which annoys but can not harm; that it is but "a fly" we now prepare to crush. There were those in his State in colonial times who laughed at and ridiculed the indignation evinced by citizens at the imposition of a tax on tea; on the requirement of a government stamp on commercial paper. They said it was but a trifle—a fly which annoyed but could not harm—yet it led to seven years of war and the independence of the colonies.

When England arrogated to herself the right to board and search American vessels on the high seas and to impress into her service American seamen, there were those in his section of the Union who said it was but a trifle; it annoyed but did not harm. They proclaimed that they would not countenance hostility or give a dollar to the prosecution of the impending war. The "fly was too small for the sledge-hammer." This country, to vindicate a right or to redress a wrong, does not look to the cost if its quarrel be just, and when any other nation proposes to trample on the rights of an American citizen, however humble he may be, the United States stands ready to protect its citizen with all its treasury and all its men.

I do not apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that these troubles will end in war, but if proper respect should not be paid the citizens of this country abroad as well as at home, national honor and national dignity alike demand that the United States shall resort, if need be, to extremes to maintain the one and assert the other. We fought over a kettle of tea; we can fight again, if necessary, over a kettle of fish.

We are told that the wise and patriotic message of the President which has called the attention of the law-making body of the Government to the needs of the hour and stirred the blood in the veins of every patriot throughout the land is but a piece of demagogy, intended to divert the attention of the country from the cry of "British free trade" which is charged against the Democratic party. It is not enough to answer that is a false clamor, raised by demagogues to divert the attention of the country from the merits of the arguments used in favor of the reduction of taxation by an attempt to excite the prejudice of the people against England. It is not enough to answer that the President of the United States is not a free-trader and to quote the language of his December message.

The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant; and the persistent claim made in certain quarters that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so-called free-traders is mischievous and far removed from any consideration for the public good.

The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers. These things can and should be done with safety to all our industries, without danger to the opportunity for remunerative labor which our workingmen need, and with benefit to them and all our people by cheapening their means of subsistence and increasing the measure of their comforts.

It is not enough to point to the conservative measure of tariff relief, known to the country as "the Mills bill," which this body has passed. The cry still goes on. I have seen men pose as the enemies of England upon this floor, who announce with an appearance of pride their birth upon the soil of the "Green Isle of the sea," who come from that section of Ireland where the inhabitants are England's staunchest friends and whose ancestors favored the hated union by which their country lost its place from among the nations of the earth. I have heard members denounce this treaty, proposed by the representatives of the two countries, and which has been rejected by the Senate, who "hob-nobbed" with, wined and dined Her Majesty's representatives whilst they were negotiating the treaty which they now denounce. "Consistency is a jewel." Is it ever worn by a Republican politician?

"British free trade!"—those who utter the cry know that England rules the markets of the world; that her sails whiten every sea; that her flag floats in every port, and they know, for many of them are sensible, well-informed statesmen, that it is the restriction upon our commerce which has destroyed our carrying trade and driven our ships from the sea.

"British free trade!"—they know that the severest blow which could be inflicted upon Great Britain would be the one aimed at her commercial supremacy, by the competition of the United States with her in the markets of the world. They know that in the race for power this nation is held back by the selfish hand of monopoly, and handicapped by unnecessary burdens, and that unrestrained and freed she would outstrip her rival.

These gentlemen know that Gladstone, "the grand old man," who would not surrender principle for place, position, or power, speaking to his own people, said that England, so far as her supremacy as a commercial nation was concerned, had nothing to fear so long as the United States kept her giant strength fettered by unnecessary protective laws. The wise statesman who honors the position he holds as President of this great country desires to destroy the power of England in the marts of trade. He desires to defeat her in the competition for commercial supremacy, and wishes to place the United States in a condition to meet and conquer her ancient enemy in every country on the globe, and make "the stars and stripes" the emblem of power on land and sea. To do this he has advised a course by the revision of our unwise revenue laws, so that "our people may have the opportunity of extending their sales beyond the limits of home consumption—saving them from the depression, interruption in business, and loss caused by a glutted domestic market, and affording their employés more certain and steady labor, with its resulting quiet and contentment." And when he, with the party he represents, desires to enter into commercial war with England our ears are assailed by the false clamor of demagogues who shout, "British free trade!" whilst they would let the flag of Great Britain, covering the commerce of the world, float defiantly in every breeze. Besides this, our President would teach England and all other foreign powers that American citizens shall be honored abroad as well as at home. In the great work he has set out to perform he should have the aid of all good citizens, and he is but a traitor to his country who dares to attempt to stay his course. [Applause.]

Mr. McCREARY. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask this House to assume that the Clerk has just read for the benefit of the House Victor Hugo's description of the devil-fish in the Toilers of the Sea. Assuming that to be done, sir, and that the House has the matter now in mind, let me say that England is the gigantic devil-fish of the nineteenth century. [Laughter and applause.] Its body rests in the bed of the North Sea; its tentacles reach over the face of the earth. This monster is sucking the blood of all nations. One of its numerous arms extends along the Mediterranean, with suction cups at Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus. It holds the commercial supremacy of that immense inland sea.

A second tentacle runs down the Red Sea, with suction stations at Alexandria, Suakim, the Straits of Bab-el-Mandelb, and Socotra, thus controlling that greatest of commercial arteries, the Suez Canal and its approaches. The life-blood of India has been drained, and Burmah is gasping under the suction of this rapacious octopus. The Malay and the Yellow Seas are virtually British waters. The monster has fastened its fingers upon every continent. It has in its grasp Cape Colony, in Africa; Guiana, in South America, and the whole Australasian continent. New Zealand and other islands of the Pacific are in its power.

Ireland is struggling manfully to free herself from its tentacles, and the Boers of the Transvaal have torn themselves from the grip. St. Helena, the Bermudas, and other islands of the Atlantic still feed its body. A nest of blistering cups in the West Indies dominates the commerce of Caribbean Sea. A cup at Belize is a sucker on the commercial life of the Gulf of Mexico. The tentacles of the monster are even now gliding over the face of our sister republic of Venezuela in an effort to rob her of her rich gold fields and to secure the mouths of the Orinoco.

But the greatest of her tentacles was fastened on the North American continent. Its grip was loosened by the American Revolution. Yet it retains its hold upon nearly half of the continent. It has slimed and is still sliming the American nation. Four times in this century has its poisonous fingers touched the heart of the American people. The first tentacle was lopped off in the war of 1812. The second tore away a part of our northeastern boundary, and the third ripped an empire and an inland sea from our boundary on the northwest. The fourth is fastened upon us in an attempt to rob us of our natural rights on the ocean. Rights are claimed for Canadians in American waters which they are not willing to grant Americans in Canadian waters. Meantime every artery of our foreign trade is being drained by this colossal devil-fish. On the Atlantic and on the Pacific its supremacy is unquestioned. Within thirty years it has robbed us of nearly the last vestige of our foreign commerce. We are chilled by contact with the body of this monstrosity and we are environed by its network of tentacles and suction cups. [Applause.]

Sir, the time has come for the United States to again declare itself free and independent of England. We are dependent upon no nation on the face of the earth. The assumption that either England or her colonies have maritime rights superior to those of any other nation is not to be based on the treaty of 1818 or upon any other treaty. It is based upon the cheek of a national bunco thief and upon the nerve of a rapacious robber. [Laughter and applause.]

Let us act promptly. Let party politics no longer pollute the patriotic fervor aroused by the retaliatory message of the President. A plague on both your houses. The people are up in their might. Let both political parties unite in strengthening the hands of a patriotic Executive and in filling the demands of a great and justly indignant nation. Give the President power to lop off an arm of this devil-fish. Let him seize this opportunity to hamstring the British lion, and as the measly-skinned beast drags its hind legs over the hot sand in weary retreat all the nations of the earth will clap their hands and roar with applause. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The time fixed for debate has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I now ask a vote.

Mr. VANDEVER. I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VANDEVER. Is this bill open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not open to amendment.

Mr. VANDEVER. I would like to offer an amendment to strike out the first section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered upon the third reading of the bill, and also upon its passage, and hence no amendments would be in order. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. McCREARY. Let the yeas and nays be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. At the request—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the vote on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to strike out——

Mr. McMILLIN. Regular order.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to amend the bill by striking out the first section.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. The regular order having been demanded, the gentleman has no right to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The regular order having been demanded, the Chair can entertain no requests for unanimous consent.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SENEY. I desire to amend the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An amendment is not in order.

Mr. SENEY. I ask that the amendment I propose to the bill be read for information.

Mr. McCREARY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Is it in order to move to recommit the bill with instructions, after the previous question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion will be in order.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I now move to recommit——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the motion is not in order now. Pending the demand for the previous question, or after the previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill, it will be in order to move to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. SENEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SENEY. Is the bill open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. By order of the House the previous question was ordered on the engrossment and third reading and on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Would it not be in order to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] may offer his resolution to annex Canada forthwith? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, the question recurring on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from New York desires now to submit a motion to recommit the bill it will be in order.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs having it in charge, with instructions to report the bill back amended by striking out the first section and changing the numbers of sections 2 and 3 to sections 1 and 2 of the bill, and upon that I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, six members only being in favor thereof.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of New York, to recommit the bill, it was rejected.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 176, nays 4, not voting 144; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to state that I am paired with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DAVIDSON. I am of the opinion that if he were present he would vote "ay," and I have therefore voted "ay."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. HOOKER, is absent, but if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. My colleagues, Mr. LAWLER and Mr. SPRINGER, are absent. If present, they would vote "ay."

Mr. CHEADLE. I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON. I am satisfied if he were present he would vote "ay," and I desire to have my name called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. CHEADLE. I did not vote, as I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, who if present would have voted "ay."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not place himself under the rule so that he could now vote.

Mr. CHEADLE. There are points under which I am permitted to vote under the pair. That is in case the vote is not a political question—and it certainly is not contended this is a political question—and to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can only vote by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to vote.

There was no objection.

Mr. GUENTHER. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. FORD. I voted "ay" because if he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. WARNER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MANSUR, and voted "ay," as, if he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. MORGAN. I voted "ay," Mr. Speaker. I am paired with Mr. MILLIKEN, of Maine, and desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My colleague, Mr. NEAL, was called home by sickness, and I desire to make this announcement, as, if he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. MORROW. I voted "ay," though I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BIGGS. If he were here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. BACON. My colleague, Mr. SPINOLA, is absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I voted inadvertently. Being paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I desire to say, for the information of the House, that I am paired with Mr. BOWDEN, and voted "ay." As I understand, if he were present he would vote "ay."

I desire also to state that my colleague, Mr. COX, whose pair has been announced, is absent on account of illness, and I am authorized to say that if he were here he would vote for the bill.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I am paired with the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. MCKINNEY, who is not present, and I therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote ay. The gentleman from New Hampshire, I believe, if present, would also vote ay.

Mr. TARSNEY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CUTCHEON, on all political questions. He is at home sick, I am sorry to say. Although I am paired with him on political questions I am entirely satisfied that if he were present he would vote "ay," and therefore I have voted "ay."

Mr. MCCREARY. My colleague, Mr. MONTGOMERY, is detained at home by sickness. If he were present he would vote for this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. My colleague, Mr. MCRAE, is also absent by reason of sickness in his family. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. WILKINSON. My colleague, Mr. BLANCHARD, is absent, but is paired. I did not hear his name called.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MCCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce to the House that it is the purpose of the Committee on Territories to make an effort to take up and dispose of the Oklahoma bill on Tuesday.

At 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m. the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 10, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting for the consideration of Congress additional estimates of deficiencies in certain appropriations for the service of the District of Columbia as submitted by the commissioners of the District, amounting to $401.49; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Quartermaster-General of the action taken by him in compliance with the provisions of an act for the relief of Edward Fitzgerald, approved May 24, 1888; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of August 20, 1888, reports from the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General of Subsistence in regard to the claims for commissary and quartermaster's supplies upon which there has been adverse departmental action, and requesting an appropriation to further comply with the resolution; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, this communication, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. SPOONER] to the communication. I think it should go to the Committee on Claims and not be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is probably best.

The communication, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers relative to the blocking of commerce through the St. Clair Flats Canal, Michigan, caused by the grounding of certain vessels, and recommending action in regard to the matter; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of De Kalb County, Alabama, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law classing druggists as liquor dealers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Reuben R. H. Melton, of Maple Creek, Carroll County, Tennessee, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10504) granting a pension to Mary Hooper;

A bill (H. R. 10224) granting a pension to Elias H. Hall; and

A bill (H. R. 8993) for the relief of Shadrack W. Brown.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3124) erecting three additional land offices in the State of Colorado, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 3528) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Coosa River at Gadsden, Ala.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3529) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth E. Tuttle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3530) granting a pension to Miss Hattie A. Dada; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 3531) for the relief of Felix McKitterick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORGAN, Mr. CALL, and Mr. EVARTS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 8990) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, now before the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent in offering the amendments to follow the plan adopted by a committee in reporting a bill with amendments, and let the amendments as printed show the part stricken out and the part inserted. I think that would be more convenient to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be received, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. EVARTS, it was Ordered, That George Lane have leave to writhdraw his petition from the files of the Senate.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. TURPIE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 500 copies additional of the report of the Pacific Railroad Commission made in January, 1888, be published for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised whether the number proposed would exceed the limit of cost that would render it necessary to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TURPIE. The former order was 200 copies, and Senators received but one copy each. I think the number suggested will not exceed the limit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps to avoid difficulty the resolution might be referred to the Committee on Printing and reported during the day.

Mr. TURPIE. If that reference be made I hope I shall be allowed to express the wish that the resolution will receive early and favorable consideration from that committee. The report is an important one, and the subject is of general interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon further inquiry the Chair is satisfied that the resolution of the Senator from Indiana need not be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that there seems to be an impression out among the people that that report has not been printed at all, and I think under the circumstances we ought to print as many copies of it as is consistent with the duty of the Senate, so that the public as well as the Senate of the United States may see what the report is. I understand that the resolution only contemplates a very few copies for the use of the Senate itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without the evidence?

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire whether there has been any considerable number of copies of that report printed with the evidence?

Mr. TURPIE. Two hundred copies were printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the resolution will be adopted at any rate.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the resolution by substituting 5,000 copies for 500 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first line of the resolution it is proposed to strike out "500" and insert "5,000;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies additional of the report of the Pacific Railroad Commission, made in January, 1888, be published for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. I have no objection at all to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts if it does not occasion a delay of the resolution by a reference of it to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment, if agreed to, would require a reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOAR. It will not take a delay of two days. The Committee on Printing always report such things instantly.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] who, I believe, is the only member of the Committee on Printing present, whether that committee has considered a resolution for the printing of the Pacific Railroad Commission report?

Mr. GORMAN. I think not, but we hope to have a meeting to-day on that subject, and I think probably during the day we shall be able to report it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Maryland will see that it is attended to.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to state again that there has been an impression in the public mind that the report is kept within the control of the Senate and not allowed to go to the public. If there has been any such disposition as that on the part of anybody, I desire that the Senate shall show a disposition to let the people know what the evidence is that has been taken on the subject, and let the country see it.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand the report has been printed. I certainly have a copy of it on my table now.

Mr. TURPIE. Only 200 copies have been printed, one for each Senator.

Mr. PLUMB. I have sent away, I think, two copies.

Mr. TURPIE. Then the Senator has had more than his share.

Mr. GORMAN. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the usual number has been printed, which is 1,900 copies. As to the order for an extra number of copies, the Committee on Printing, I understand, are waiting for the estimate required under the law to be submitted before the resolution is reported.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator state that there have been 1,900 copies already printed?

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the usual number, 1,900 copies, have been already printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I was inquired of about it and I sent to the document-room and to the Printing Office, and got the information that the document had been printed in the ordinary way, that the usual number had been printed. So far as it was known in either place there had been no delay made which was not inevitable upon the printing of so large a mass of matter. But if there is a proposition to print a larger number for distribution, that I know nothing about.

Mr. HOAR. It is quite obvious that this resolution of the Senator from Indiana, unless it be amended, will not answer his own purpose. It will give only 7 copies to each Senator for distribution, and wherever there is any public interest in the matter there will not be enough to satisfy the demand. So it seems to me the number ought to be enlarged.

The Senator fears that there may be some delay by a reference. We are assured by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that the Committee on Printing expect to have a meeting to-day, so they will be able to report it very likely in the course of the day. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If there is any delay about the matter of printing 5,000 copies of this report, I hope that the report as already made, to wit, the printing of 1,900 copies, which I understand the Senator from Maryland to say the committee have ordered, will be made at once.

Mr. COCKRELL. That order has already been made.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have had repeated requests for this report, and I have been unable to obtain it. There is an impression in the public mind that by some agency or other the report is being suppressed. I presume I have had applications from my own State from more than one hundred people who desire the report, and I have been unable to get a single copy for distribution. I hope the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if he can supply the demands of his own constituents if he is given only 7 copies?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Not at all. If we would print the 1,900 copies at once and order 4,500 more it would be a great deal better.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that the 1,900 have been already printed. The Senator from Maryland so stated.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Where are they? They are not for distribution in the Capitol.

Mr. GORMAN. So far from there being any foundation for the impression alluded to by the Senator from New Jersey, that it has gone out to the country that there is any attempt to suppress this report, it is as far from the truth as anything possibly could be. It is like many other idle reports. When the Senate orders a document to be printed, the usual number, 1,900 copies, is printed. This document went through the usual process and 1,900 copies were printed, one copy of it being supplied to every Senator and the remainder disposed of as the law requires. Senators may find in the document-room extra copies, if they have not been already disposed of.

All know that members of the Committee on Printing have been absent, and the Committee on Printing have not had an opportunity to consider any resolution for an extra number of copies. There has been no attempt on the part of anybody to suppress the document, and there is no excuse for such a statement by the public press, here or elsewhere.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose the Senator from Maryland will understand that there is no criticism upon the committee because of the absence of a resolution before the committee to increase the number beyond that required by the rules of the Senate. Certainly the committee would not be expected to act upon the matter without having a resolution before them. Surely I have no intention to criticise the committee in any sense or form. The committee state that they have already had printed 1,900 copies, all that they are allowed under the rule to print, and that is sufficient. But this report was made last December and submitted to the Senate, and so far as I know no copies of it can be obtained now in the document-room; at least I inquired a few days ago for copies there and they had not yet reached the document-room. There is some fault somewhere. Where it is I shall not undertake to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as amended will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

W. H. FORNEY,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I move the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

ELIZA N. AIKEN.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up House bill 10856, a pension bill for Eliza N. Aiken, an old lady who gave her life almost as a nurse in the Army. She is now between seventy and seventy-five years old, and I understand is in need as well as sick. I should like to have the bill passed this morning. There is a report accompanying it.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 10856) for pension for Eliza N. Aiken, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension-roll the name of Eliza N. Aiken, late nurse of Sixth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, at $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAMPAIGN WORK BY A SENATE EMPLOYÉ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in relation to campaign work by a Senate employé, which comes over from a preceding day. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PLUMB. I should have no objection to the resolution being adopted if it was not perfectly apparent that it would apply to a Senate employé a rule which we have no power to apply to a House employé. The Senate now knows perfectly well that what it is charged Mr. McKee was doing has been done by an employé of the Democratic House of Representatives. It is not proper for us, of course, to investigate that. If the resolution could be amended so as to investigate the House employé, I should be perfectly willing to have the resolution passed, but it would be an unnecessary humiliation on the part of the Senate to investigate one of its own employés for doing what the co-ordinate body permits its employés to do.

Mr. VEST. It is not my purpose to consume any of the time of the Senate by discussing this matter. I have said all I propose to say about it. Having called the attention of the Senate to the nature of the publication, the Senator from Kansas has again asserted that there is a parallel existing between a publication by an employé of the House and the publication made by Mr. McKee, an employé of the Senate. Since he has made that statement (for I had never seen the publication when he brought it here in his remarks the other day) I have examined the book carefully from beginning to end, and I assert that it is not partisan, and I defy the Senate to point to a single line or syllable in that work which is partisan. It is simply a compilation of the messages of the Presidents of the United States, from 1789 down to this time, upon the subject of the tariff. The introduction to it, which is in these words:

"Of making books there is no end—and much study is a weariness of the flesh;" and so, in this day of hurry and of labor-saving machinery and appliances, the issue of "such a little one" as this, to save the scholar and the statesman, the doctrinaire and the materialist some hours' search seems hardly to need apology.

There is nothing original offered, since comment would defeat the object of a reference book for all by making it distasteful to some. It is only the gathering together of what has been said by our century of Presidents on the tariff; extracts made at odd times for my own use, until the manuscript had grown too bulky to be longer convenient; and now it is printed, partly for that convenience and partly for that a friend or two has encouraged me in the belief that the current demand for any literature on this engrossing subject will justify offering it to the public in cheap form.

There is not one single line or syllable of comment in this whole work. It is no more a partisan work than Spofford's American Almanac. It is simply made for the convenience of public men, and it contains, permit me to say, in the messages of the Presidents of the United States far more in behalf of a high protective tariff system than for the opposite opinion.

Yet the Senator from Kansas brought that here and introduced it as a parallel publication to that of Mr. McKee, which is full, from beginning to end, of the most extreme partisan comments and utterances. There is no parallel between the two cases, and I say if the Senator can find one syllable that militates against what I have said I will stand convicted and pilloried before the country as having made an unfair, a partisan, and a false statement.

Mr. HOAR. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to lay upon the table the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. The title of the resolution will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution by Mr. VEST in relation to campaign work by a Senate employé.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that motion is not debatable, but it has been debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not debatable, but debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator from Kansas will withdraw the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, I will withdraw the motion for the present, so as to allow what may be said to be said on the main question.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. VEST, September 3, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee to examine the several branches of the civil service be instructed to inquire whether the employés of the Senate, whilst receiving pay, and when the Senate has been in session, have been engaged in preparing partisan campaign literature for the purpose of advancing the interests of the Republican party in the pending canvass, and whether publication of the matter so prepared has been published by an employé of the Senate with his official character printed thereon, and what legislation is necessary to prevent and punish such conduct, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri the other day spoke with some severity, one might almost say with some contempt, of the doctrine which is known popularly by the name of civil-service reform. Considering that some of the persons who were zealous advocates of that reform have adopted the present Executive as the exponent of their theories and as a practical example of the excellent doctrine which they propose, I am not surprised at the opinions of the Senator from Missouri; but I desire to say for myself, that whoever may have changed his mind, or whoever without a change of mind may have expressed disapprobation of the endeavor to divorce the civil service of this country from politics, my own opinion upon that question, which I have often expressed, remains unchanged.

I think it is one of the worst things in the present administration of our politics that the offices which are created for the service of the people should be used to bribe them. Neither party, no party that has ever had any considerable power in State or nation in this country is free from reproach in this matter. We have seen the civil officers of the country, paid from the public Treasury, first becoming the large and perhaps the chief instrumentality of political management by the party in power.

That, after getting thoroughly established, as it was, in our political methods, was succeeded by a state of things which was still worse, and the civil servants of the country, the men in the Treasury Department, in the Post-Office, and in other branches of the public service became, and were expected to become, prominent and active politicians. Sometimes a man holding a seat in the Senate, sometimes a man aspiring to a seat in the Senate, sometimes holding a seat in the other House, or an executive officer of a State, and sometimes a man aspiring to that office, would get the ear of the appointing power, and members of the same party would be appointed and displaced as they favored or did not favor the aspirations of particular ambitious politicians. I think that was all wrong. I think it was corrupt. I think it was of evil example and influence; and it ought to have been suppressed.

But that is a very different thing from the doctrine which the Senator from Missouri avows. I think the public servants of this country (except those who are expected to carry out the political policies in the administration of the President, who should have a liberal construction of that rule) should be chosen without regard to their political opinions, just as the officers of a church or the officers of a bank are chosen. I think it can be done. I think the civil-service law passed in the Congress before the last was a step towards that accomplishment, and has worked well as far as it has been fairly and properly carried out.

I was in hopes when the present Executive came in that he would take another firm, forward step in the same direction, and I was correspondingly disappointed when I found that he was turning out nearly every Territorial judge in this country. Surely, if anybody, such officers should be removed from political considerations in the question of their appointment or their continuance in service. In those cases a Republican was displaced by a Democrat. The President has not done any worse in that matter than some of his predecessors, and I do not say this by way of reproach to him, but he certainly in that respect has not done any better.

However, that is a very different thing from saying that when a civil servant is appointed and continued in the civil service, as he ought to be, solely on considerations of fitness and honesty and fidelity in the service, he should be debarred from any of the privileges and rights of active citizenship. No pressure ought to be put upon an officer for partisan service or for partisan contribution, especially by the appointing power; but I hold that an officer of this Government is just as much entitled to express his opinion on the stump, by attending caucuses, by political activity, by the preparation of publications like the one referred to in the resolution or the one which has been referred to by the Senator from Kansas, as an officer of a church or an officer of a bank. When Mr. McKee wishes to give an assurance of his competency, or thoroughness, or fidelity, in a publication like that, I do not see why he is not as much entitled to add to his political pamphlet that he is a clerk in the employ of the Senate of the United States as the Senator from Missouri is to add to a pamphlet edition of one of his speeches that he is a Senator from the State of Missouri.

Mr. VEST. As I understand the Senator, then, if he will permit me, he thinks it is perfectly legitimate for an employé of the Senate, over his official signature, to issue a partisan pamphlet.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what the Senator means by the term "over his official signature."

Mr. VEST. As this pamphlet contains it, "Assistant Librarian of the Senate."

Mr. HOAR. I understand. That is just what I am talking about. I say that the assistant librarian of the Senate may make a compilation of arguments, if he thinks he can be useful to his fellow-citizens in that way, and in that way can exert his honest right as an American citizen in favor of one view or the other of the tariff, in favor of one view or the other of the national-banking system, or anything else, and he may add on the title page of a document that he publishes the name of any office which he holds which entitles him to trust and confidence or respect just as much as the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only printed.

Mr. HOAR. It is only printed there. There is no signature. It is not over his official signature, but he makes known the fact that he holds that office just as the Senator from Missouri would add the fact that he held his present office of Senator.

It seems to me that the opponents of this reform have misunderstood its purpose and theory, as much as its pretended friends. Near the close of the last administration the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], a bitter and zealous opponent of this proposition, who I regret not now to see in his seat, offered a bill which I should like to have the Secretary read and have the Senator from Missouri listen to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill to prohibit officers and employés of the United States from contributing money for political purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be lawful for any person holding any office under the United States, or any employé thereof, to contribute or pay to any committee or person, or into any fund, any money, property, or valuable thing for any political purpose whatsoever, or to pay any assessment or percentage upon the income or emoluments of his office or position for any political purpose, or to give, lend, advance, or pay any money, property, or valuable thing with the intent, or with the assent, permission, or understanding, that the same may be applied to or for any political purpose whatsoever, or to himself or herself apply the same to any political purpose. No head of a Department or other superior officer shall himself collect, or permit or allow any other person to collect or receive, from any officer or employé in his Department or under his supervision, or from any other officer or employé whatsoever, any assessment, percentage, contribution, gift, loan, or advance of any money, property, or valuable thing, with the intent, understanding, or permission that the same shall or may be used for any political purpose.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, and, in the discretion of the court, by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and, on conviction, shall be forever thereafter disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States. Any officer of the United States who shall violate any provision of this act shall, in addition to such imprisonment and fine, be deemed and taken to have vacated the office by him held.

Mr. HOAR. I send to the Secretary's desk a few remarks made by the Senator from Indiana in favor of that bill. The remarks which are marked I should like to have read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1511) to prohibit officers and employés of the United States from contributing money for political purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. In connection with the bill I have introduced, if the Senate will indulge me a moment, I should like to say a few words.

It is perfectly notorious and known, I think, to all, that at this time, in spite of existing laws and in violation of them, political assessments are going on pretty much the same as ever. Men are not required to contribute, perhaps; and it may be said in one sense they voluntarily contribute; but it is simply that voluntary action which is produced by fear of losing his place, performed for the purpose of making himself solid and square with political managers.

I am prepared to show under proper circumstances the fact that money for political purposes is being raised now throughout the various Departments of this Government. The bill which I have introduced is the only bill and the only legislation which will cure this evil; that is, to make it a penal offense on the part of the contributor to make such contributions; not merely to punish the offender, but to punish the man who pays. That may seem like harsh legislation; so it does; yet ninety-nine out of every hundred of the officials desire such legislation, desire to be armed with such an answer to those political managers and machine bosses who come here and walk through these corridors and look at clerks with a significance which is well understood. I have seen some of these gentlemen around here within the last few weeks flitting about like birds of prey, of evil omen. I wish to arm the poor clerk—who needs every cent he gets and more, too, to support his wife and children—with an answer to these men that he can not contribute money for such purposes without laying himself liable to the penalties of the law.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of that proceeding?

The CHIEF CLERK. February 12, 1884.

Mr. HOAR. I stated that it was near the close of the last administration.

Mr. President, here are a bill and a speech by an eminent Democratic member of this body implying that he thinks, if he has not changed his mind, that the present Chief Executive Magistrate of this country ought to be sent to the penitentiary, ought at once to vacate his office, and ought to be rendered incapable of holding any office of trust under the Government hereafter. He says that the people who made these contributions were inspired by the fear of losing their office, and I suppose nobody would question that that high official was inspired very actively by the fear of losing his office.

I do not cite that as indicating any agreement of mine with the honorable Senator from Indiana. Indeed, I think that a public officer is as much entitled to make contributions voluntarily and of his own thought to a political cause in which he is interested as any private citizen, and that the doctrine of civil-service reform rests on no such theory as that which the Senator from Missouri bases this resolution upon or as that which the Senator from Indiana based this bill upon.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I must be permitted to express my surprise at the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that there is any parallel between a speech or an utterance by a member of the Senate and the publication of such a book as that which I have produced here, emanating from Mr. McKee, an employé of the Senate. A part of my functions, and those of every other Senator of the United States, is the free utterance and declaration of my opinions as to all public questions.

Mr. HOAR. Is not that true of every citizen of the United States, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will let me finish my sentence, I will yield to him with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. It is a part of my duty. I am sent here by the people of Missouri for that purpose, and so far is this doctrine carried and this duty enforced that under the Constitution and laws of the United States every member of either House of Congress has an immunity from arrest and annoyance by reason of anything he may say in either House in debate. The whole spirit and autonomy of our Government contemplate that the representatives of the people shall exercise their highest functions and their most sacred duties when they express before the whole American people their opinions upon all questions, political and otherwise, that come within the jurisdiction of Congress.

But who has ever heard before that the employés of the Senate, the doorkeepers who are put here to keep these doors, the Librarian who is put here to take charge of our books, and all the different employés of the Senate who are merely ministerial in their capacity, are appointed for the purpose of using those positions in order to influence the people of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. Now, will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. My question is whether it is not the right and the duty of every American citizen (unless he holds a judicial office which renders it improper) to express his opinions freely on public questions?

Mr. VEST. Most unquestionably in his personal capacity, and if Mr. McKee had published this work and put his name upon every page of it at the top and bottom, and upon the fly-leaves, I should not have objected.

But, Mr. President, the fallacy, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to use the term, in his position and argument to-day is in simply ignoring the difference between a ministerial officer of this body and a Senator of the United States, a part of whose functions is unquestionably the utterance of his opinions upon all political questions. It is expected that these opinions may influence the country, and he is sent here in order to give them a frank and manly expression upon this floor.

And now let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts, what would be the condition of this body, equally divided as it is, if every employé of this Senate should turn himself, as Mr. McKee has done, into a factor for political purposes? I deliver an address here upon a political question as a United States Senator. Mr. McKee answers it the next day with a political pamphlet, not as the Senator says with a compendium, but with quotations from the speeches of Democratic Senators and Representatives and his comments, sarcastic and otherwise, upon what his political opponents have said. Is that seemly? Does any Senator now deliberately contemplating this thing justify such a course? If Mr. McKee can do this, a Democratic employé can do the same thing; and I can imagine the criticism of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts if one of his eloquent harangues here, or orations to use a more respectful term, should the next day be criticised, after the fashion of Mr. McKee, by a pamphlet issued by a Democratic employé of the Senate. Not for one instant is the idea to be tolerated.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. VEST. If I can hear the Senator.

Mr. PADDOCK. This resolution, as it is framed, requires an investigation as to whether an employé has been engaged in doing work to further the interests of the Republican party. I do not understand how, under this resolution, an employé who may be engaged in furthering the interests of the Democratic party can be investigated.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection, as a matter of course, to amending this resolution so as to include employés on both sides of the Chamber, because in the remarks which I submitted the other day I distinctly asserted that if any Democratic employé was guilty of this thing he ought to be punished in just the same degree as a Republican employé, and I intended nothing invidious in the language I employed.

I did not propose to discuss the matter at all to-day; but as the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded to the fact that I had declared publicly that I was opposed to what was known as the civil-service law, I want to say frankly what I think in regard to that law and what my position is about it. I voted for it. Those of us who were here at that time members of the Senate will recollect that when that bill was under discussion the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] offered amendments to the effect that the law should not go into effect until employés in the bureaus of the Government should be equal in number as between the respective political parties. Those amendments were voted down. I voted for those amendments, but they were defeated. What then? Then the Republican majority of the Senate passed that bill, retaining in office the Republican employés who to-day fill the bureaus and the Departments of the Government, whilst every member of the Democratic party, who has been excluded from every office for twenty-five years, is compelled to undergo the classified civil-service examination before he can get into the service.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator bring to the attention of the Senate the provision of the civil-service law which requires the retention of anybody in the classified service of the Government a single moment of time after the President or the head of the Department is desirous of removing him?

Mr. VEST. That, as a matter of course, is a hypercritical criticism for this reason, that the spirit of the law was understood by everybody that the President should turn out nobody on account of political differences of opinion with him or his party, and it was understood when those amendments were voted down, and the debate shows (and I recollect it it as well as if it had happened but one hour ago), that all the Republican employés should remain in the bureaus and Departments.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say, as far as that statement is concerned, that it does not include me at all. I never understood that that was the spirit of the law. I understood and now understand that that law dealt not with the existing service, but with the service as it was to be by the introduction of the new members into it.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course——

Mr. PLUMB. And that the President of the United States is under no limitation whatever, either by public sentiment, the popular construction of the law, or by legislative construction, that requires him to keep in office one single person, Democrat or Republican, a single instant beyond the time that he believes the public service is benefited by such retention.

Mr. VEST. It is true the law was intended to apply in futuro; it was intended to apply to applicants for positions in the Departments after the date of its passage; but the fact that these amendments were voted down showed unquestionably that the opinion of the majority of the Senate and that the intention was that the employés then in the Departments and bureaus should be retained, unless they were discharged on account of inefficiency. That has been the popular construction of the law, and I have never yet heard it doubted; and if the President of the United States or the heads of Departments had undertaken to put a different construction upon it and had turned out the employés in the Departments because they have been Republicans, liberty would have lain bleeding in the streets, and we should have heard a denunciation of the President in comparison to which what we have heard heretofore has been mere love work. We all know that was the construction put upon the law after the amendments were voted down.

I voted for the law because I indorsed the principle of civil-service reform, because I believed the public offices should not be used as rewards for political service; but at the same time I never relinquished my opinion, and I hold it to-day, that the operation of this law is unjust to a majority of the people of the United States, who are Democrats. It assumes that the men in office are qualified to hold on, while those who are out of office shall appear and be examined in order to make them eligible. It puts a qualification and a limitation upon applicants hereafter not put upon the men who are in office to-day, and the result is that here under a Democratic administration, as I stated the other day, are whole bureaus of Republicans, with hardly a single Democrat to be found amongst them. In the face of this fact the President of the United States is denounced as false to the civil-service theory and as having been hypocritical in his professions of attachment to it.

If the law had been equitable and just in its operations, if it had been applied to both parties alike, the principle would be correct. The spoils system in politics, as it is understood throughout the country, is wrong in so far as it permits the offices of the country, without regard to qualification, to be used for the advancement of any individual or for the success of any party. Whilst I say this honestly and without any sort of qualification, I think I have a right to demand at the same time that there should be no proscriptive feature against the members of the party to which I belong. This law ought to have contained within itself a provision to make it equitable and just to all the people of the United States.

All I have ever said, and I repeat it here as I have repeated it elsewhere, is that I believe with equal qualifications the members of the political party in power should hold the ministerial offices of the Government as well as the political offices. I believe it is just, right, honest, fair, and legitimate in every sense of the term. If the Republican party is in power, its friends should administer the Government from top to bottom, from end to end, and if the Democrats are in power they should do the same thing. That is a far different proposition from the spoils system, which declares that, without regard to qualification, the offices should be divided out as rewards for political services. Other things being equal, between a qualified Democrat and a qualified Republican, I hope never to see the hour in which I will not give any of the offices, from the highest to the lowest, in this country to the members of my party. In so far I am a civil-service reformer and no further.

A few words more and I am done with this subject. The Senator from Massachusetts satirically talks about the President of the United States and his civil-service reform. What is the history of this civil-service reform movement according to the record? In 1870 General Grant sent a message to Congress in which he asked that an appropriation of $25,000 be made to pay the expenses of a civil-service commission. The message was strong, urgent, eloquent. Under this appeal the $25,000 appropriation was made. Mr. Dorman B. Eaton was put at the head of that commission. It remained in existence two years, with an annual appropriation for each of these years of $25,000. Then Congress, with an absolute and overwhelming Republican majority in both branches and a Republican President, declined to appropriate another dollar, and civil-service reform, as it was called, fell dead, pulseless, at the hands of the Republican party.

General Grant was succeeded by Mr. Hayes, and although in his first and every subsequent message, I believe, he urged upon Congress the propriety of re-establishing this commission and making an appropriation annually of $25,000, the Republicans still holding the power in Congress, nothing was done. And in the succeeding administration General Garfield, who was an outspoken and eloquent advocate of civil-service reform when a member of the House of Representatives, in his first message recommended an appropriation of $25,000, but unavailingly and without effect.

Mr. PLUMB. I know the Senator desires to be accurate. I therefore call his attention to the fact that he says the Republicans had the entire legislative power during the entire Hayes administration.

Mr. VEST. I said—and I know to what the Senator alludes—that they were still in power; they had the majority of power; they had the Chief Executive and the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. During the last two years of the Hayes administration the Democrats had this body by ten majority, and they had the other House during his entire term.

Mr. VEST. Very good. Let the Senator have the full benefit of his interjection.

Mr. PLUMB. I only wanted that the Senator might be correct.

Mr. VEST. Now we come to the next administration, the President of the United States still being a Republican. Mr. Garfield urged upon Congress this appropriation, and no appropriation was made. Mr. Arthur urged the same appropriation, and it was not made.

In 1883, the elections in the fall of that year having resulted most disastrously to the Republican party throughout the country, the House of Representatives having gone Democratic by an overwhelming majority, the Pendleton bill, as it was called, which is now in force, was acted on. It had been reported in the preceding session of Congress. It was reported from the committee to examine the several branches of the civil service. It came here, was placed upon the Calendar, no attention was paid to it, it was moribund and dead until after the elections in the fall of 1882.

The country then went overwhelmingly Democratic. We assembled here in December. Our friends on the other side with pale and ghastly faces looked at each other and asked, "What is the reason of this most disastrous result in November last?" Then, under the dictation of the Republican caucus, to the astonishment of the whole country, the Pendleton bill, emanating from a Democrat, was taken up as a Republican measure, passed through the Senate and House of Representatives, and became a law. That is the history of civil-service reform.

For years and years this bill, which is said now by the Senator from Massachusetts always to have received his support, remained in the Presidents' messages and afterward upon the Calendar without any notice being taken of it by the Republican party in the slightest degree.

That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senator from Missouri in his last sentences did not mean to imply that I personally had not manifested my support of the doctrine in season and out of season throughout all these years. I certainly did everywhere.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have but a word to say in regard to this subject. I have always made it a rule when any Senator desires an examination into the conduct of any officer of the Senate, or of any officer of the Government, or of any member of this body, to vote for the resolution of investigation as a matter of course. I shall vote for this resolution now. I think, therefore, the motion of the Senator from Kansas ought to have been withdrawn; and yet I feel bound to say that Mr. McKee did nothing but what he had a lawful right to do, if it was done outside of office hours and without interfering with his official duties. The book he presents, instead of being a partisan document, contains extracts in favor of a particular idea, that is, the protection idea, extracts from messages of Presidents of the United States, from speeches of Senators and members of the House, carefully arranged with a view to aid any one who believes in that doctrine in expressing his opinions and fortifying his views. Although I believe that everything Mr. McKee did was right and proper, and that he will come before this committee and with an open hand state exactly what he has done, I shall vote for the resolution and any amendment that will call out any information in regard to similar conduct by any officer of the Government, whether a Republican or a Democrat.

Mr. PLUMB. I have withdrawn the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. PLUMB. I have withdrawn the motion in order to enable the discussion to go on, and have not renewed it.

Mr. VEST. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio—of course I do not choose to be put in the position of attacking this gentleman unjustly, who is not here on the floor of the Senate—does he mean to say that this book only contains a compendium?

Mr. SHERMAN. Some parts of this book I have read and derived information from.

Mr. VEST. That is not the proposition. I have read it, and can show it in extenso, and I say that this book, so far from being a compendium, as the Senator says, of messages and speeches, contains the partisan comments of this gentleman upon Democratic speeches, ridiculing them. The reductio ad absurdum is the slightest sort of argument he uses.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ought he not to ridicule doctrines that he believes to be offensive or unjust or absurd? Will you deny to an officer of the Senate, because he is an officer of the Senate, the right to publish his opinions? Certainly not. It is true that here and there he makes comments in this compilation, for it is nothing but a compilation. Here is an introduction, commencing with Madison's resolutions and Hamilton's report, and closing with the Mills bill, in all two or three pages of matter, and then follows twelve hundred and fifty-four selections arranged in alphabetical and numerical order. Each selection has a number, and so it goes, with here and there probably a mere phrase to hang on and connect the different clauses together; and if he does ridicule any opinions that are offensive to him, I do not see why he has not the right to do so.

Mr. VEST. As an officer of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not as an officer of the Senate. If he neglects his duty; if, in this investigation, which I hope will be granted, it shall be shown that Mr. McKee has neglected his duties, though he has the reputation of being one of the very best officers of the Senate; if it be shown that he did this at a time when he ought to have been doing something in regard to the public interests, then it would be different. But the idea of making complaints about this!

I hope somebody will offer a general resolution to extend this inquiry so that we may know whether the statements made in the newspapers are true as to what is said to be done in the various offices of the Government, and make it an object worth inquiring into. So far as Mr. McKee is concerned, I have no doubt he will come forward as an honest man and tell you why he did this. He did not print his compilation at the public expense; the public has nothing to do with it; and I do not see any object in making any fuss about it. I shall vote for the resolution of inquiry.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection, let me say to the Senator, to making this resolution as broad as possible.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not offer any amendment, because I do not choose to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] withdrew his motion to lay upon the table, as he said, for the purpose of enabling discussion to go on. As he is not now present, the Chair will assume that it was his intention to renew it when the discussion ceased.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator stated, I think, a few moments ago when the Senator from Ohio was on the floor, that he had withdrawn that motion and had not renewed it, and I understood him to say that he did not intend to renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think he intended to renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then recurs upon agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The resolution was agreed to.

TRANSIT OF GOODS IN BOND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. CULLOM August 30, 1888, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States in his message of August 23, 1888, concerning our relations with Canada, advises Congress that Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, which provided for the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond over the territory of the United States to or from Canada is no longer in force; and

Whereas in the same message the President also advises Congress that section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, passed to carry into effect the provisions of said Article XXIX is no longer in force; and

Whereas section 3005 of the Revised Statutes only authorizes the transit through the territory of the United States of merchandise destined for Canada and arriving from abroad at New York, Boston, Portland in Maine (or at such other ports as may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury): Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the transit in bond over or across the territory of the United States, without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise coming from Canada has been permitted since July 1, 1885, when Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, and section 3 of the act of March 1, 1873, are said to have ceased to be in force; and, if so, to what extent and by what authority of law.

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing to let that go upon the Calendar for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed upon the Calendar.

DAMAGES TO CHINESE SUBJECTS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, which I ask to have read at length.

The bill (S. 3532) to appropriate money for the relief of certain Chinese subjects was read the first time at length, as follows:

Whereas Chinese subjects, being in remote and unsettled regions of the United States, have been the victims of injuries on their persons and property at the hands of lawless men, for which unexpected events the Chinese Government has claimed an indemnity the legal obligation of which the Government of the United States denies; and whereas the Government of the United States humanely considering these injuries and bearing in mind the friendship between the United States and China, is desirous of alleviating the exceptional and deplorable sufferings and losses to which the aforesaid Chinese have been subjected: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $276,619.75 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the Chinese minister at this capital, as full indemnity for all losses and injuries sustained by Chinese subjects who are mentioned in the preamble to this act; the said money to be distributed to the relief of said sufferers and their relatives in such sums and in such manner as the Government of China through its minister to the United States may direct.

Mr. MORGAN. If it will not be objectionable to the Senate I should like to submit a very few observations on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the second reading of the bill of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HOAR. Is the bill introduced for present passage or for reference?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall move to refer it to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read the first time at length and will be considered read the second time by title.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in the treaty which was sent to us by the President of the United States in regard to Chinese immigration, and which was passed upon by the Senate without any amendment in respect of the fifth article, the following language is found:

ARTICLE V.

Whereas Chinese subjects, being in remote and unsettled regions of the United States, have been the victims of injuries in their persons and property at the hands of wicked and lawless men, which unexpected events the Chinese Government regrets, and for which it has claimed an indemnity the legal obligation of which the Government of the United States denies; and whereas the Government of the United States, humanely, considering these injuries and bearing in mind the firm and ancient friendship between the United States and China, which the high contracting parties wish to cement, is desirous of alleviating the exceptional and deplorable sufferings and losses to which the aforesaid Chinese have been subjected: therefore, the United States, without reference to the question of liability therefor (which as a legal obligation it denies), agrees to pay on or before the 1st day of March, 1889, the sum of $276,619.75 to the Chinese minister at this capital, who shall accept the same, on behalf of his government, as full indemnity for all losses and injuries sustained by Chinese subjects as aforesaid, and shall distribute the said money among the said sufferers and their relatives.

The treaty from which I have read the fifth article contains in substance the provision in this bill together with the appropriation in the bill of the sum of money necessary to extinguish this claim. The Senate of the United States in passing upon this treaty made no amendment to this fifth article; so that we have the concurrence of the President and of the Senate in sending to China the negotiation as amended by the Senate containing this clause. We have now before us, up for almost immediate consideration, a bill which enacts for the period of five years to come the provisions of the first and second articles of this treaty and also of the third article, excluding Chinese laborers from the United States. That bill may in its terms go to a very slight extent farther than the treaty engagement between the two governments, even as amended by the Senate, but the difference is insubstantial, it is not very material, between the bill and the treaty as we proposed it to China.

The difference in the two cases is that in the Chinese treaty, which is now pending and being considered by that government, the exclusion of all laborers was to continue for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of ratifications; whereas the bill that has passed the Senate and is now subject to a motion to reconsider and a motion to lay that motion on the table, is supplementary to the act of 1882, and provides that during the operation or continuance of that act, which was limited to ten years, the exclusion of Chinese laborers shall be absolute. So, then, treating the Articles I and II of this proposed negotiation and the bill that is now pending before the Senate as being substantially identical in their provisions, we find that the treaty makes provision for the exclusion of Chinese laborers for twenty years; whereas the bill, being a supplement to the act of 1882, would exclude them only for the remaining period of ten years from the date of that act, which would be not quite five years from this time.

Now, in passing that bill, for which I have voted and for the principles of which I am an advocate, I would very much prefer to introduce into that measure so much of the fifth article of the treaty that we have sent to China as is embodied in the bill I have now introduced. Some few of the recitals are omitted, being unnecessary to give a full definition of the attitude of the United States towards China upon this subject.

I do not wish that the Chinese Government should have any just ground for the opinion that we are acting in a spirit of hostility or, as it may be called, of animosity towards the Chinese Government. That is not the spirit that characterizes the American legislation on this subject. The only question presented by the pending bill as contradistinguished from the question presented by the treaty is whether we shall take in the United States legislative control of this question of Chinese immigration, or whether we shall take the control of it by treaty agreement between the United States and China. That is the only proposition that is up at all.

In respect of the legislation that is proposed here now there is this objection and this difficulty, that the treaty of 1880, modifying the Burlingame treaty of 1868, contained a provision that we shall not absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States, but that we may suspend their coming for a reasonable time. That is also coupled with a provision that the legislation we may enact on that subject shall be submitted to the Chinese Government. The proposition to submit that legislation to the Chinese Government is not a proposition that that Government shall interfere with the passage of a law before it becomes such, nor that it shall have any right to claim that the law is anything else than a mere violation of the treaty rights. In other words, that provision reserves, as diplomatists call it, a diplomatic question which the Chinese Government have the right to call to the attention of the United States by treaty agreement as a subject for immediate discussion and diplomatic action. That is all the effect of that part of the treaty which requires us to give the Chinese Government any notice at all of what legislation we have resorted to for the purpose of executing the provisions of that treaty.

Now, as to the proposition that we shall not prohibit absolutely the coming of Chinese laborers here, in making that agreement with China in the treaty of 1880 we have put it in their power to say that while that treaty subsists the Government of the United States will not prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to this country absolutely and unequivocally; so that the legislation we are now proposing repeals that part of the treaty of 1880. It does not do so in express terms, as I wish it did; it does so by indirection; it does so by hostile or repugnant legislation, legislation that is absolutely inconsistent with that provision of the treaty of 1880. The legislative power in the United States being supreme over the treaty-making power, in the exercise of that supreme power we revoke the treaty of 1880 so far as it relates to the right of the United States or the pledge of the United States in regard to the exclusion absolutely of the coming of Chinese into the United States, for the bill does exclude them and that treaty does say that we shall not exclude them absolutely. Standing opposed to each other in this way, the treaty, of course, is repealed by the effect and operation of the law that we are about now to pass.

There is another difficulty surrounding this question of a very embarrassing character. Both Houses of Congress have passed a bill and have sent it to the President of the United States, for the purpose of enforcing the treaty submitted by the President to the Senate at the present session, about four months ago, and of course that bill must be either returned to the House in which it originated, which is the Senate, within ten days, or it must become by the operation of the Constitution of the United States a law. So then at the time we are passing a bill here for the purpose of repealing the treaty of 1880 we have another bill now in the hands of the President passed by both Houses of Congress, for the purpose of carrying into execution this new treaty.

That treaty and this statute can not stand together both as operative law. This new treaty and the statute we propose to enact now are substantially alike, but the one, as a matter of course, excludes the other from its influence upon the statute-book. One or the other of them becomes brutum fulmen the moment this last bill is passed and signed by the President of the United States. Now, which one is it? It must be the treaty, because the act of Congress we are now considering is a later act and it is directly opposed to the treaty of 1880, repeals that treaty, and it would override this engagement if it were to-day signed, for the reason that it would be an assumption on the part of the United States Government that the matter of Chinese immigration to this country should hereafter be regulated by the laws of the United States and not by treaty engagement with China. Our attitude would be discretionary were that not the later act, the one that is now before the Senate of the United States. We would assert the proposition that the coming of Chinese immigration into this country was a matter which we had a right to regulate by law, notwithstanding any treaty engagement which we might have made.

So, then, if this act which we are now passing and this treaty were identical in terms, the later act would override the treaty as a matter of course, and would put us on the footing where we should have declared by act of Congress that hereafter the relations between China and the United States relating to immigration should depend entirely upon the exercise of legislative will and power on the part of the United States, and should not depend in any degree at all upon consent to be obtained from China.

So far as I am concerned, I have reached the conclusion that the latter is the better phase of the case. I have reached the conclusion that the American decree that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] spoke of has gone forth, and it is an irrevocable decree, that hereafter Chinese are to be excluded from the United States, those of certain classes, and that this exclusion must be worked out through the operation of our own laws and not through an engagement or agreement with China. I propose to adhere to that ground now that we have reached it.

It has been charged that I have reached that ground with reluctance. That is not true. I have worked towards that ground as far and as fast as I could go, but I have not been willing to expose the commerce of $25,000,000 a year between the United States and China to any sudden shock by the enactment of a law which would give to China the option, the right, to declare that all of her commercial agreements with us were at an end if she chose so to declare; but since this treaty has been made, and since the declaration has gone forth from the Chinese minister in the solemn form that it is now presented to the United States Government, that it is the policy of the Chinese Empire that their people shall be prevented from coming here, I have felt myself from that moment of time at perfect liberty to co-operate with that sentiment on the part of the Chinese Empire and to enact laws of the United States which should prohibit their coming here. What is that declaration? I will repeat it, although it has been frequently read before the Senate.

And whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much-deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the immigration of such laborers from China to the United States,

After that solemn declaration on the part of the Chinese Government, communicated through her minister to the President of the United States and by him to the Senate, and after we have returned a treaty with our own amendments upon it to the Chinese Government containing that same declaration, I feel that the battle has been won, so far as Chinese opinion or sentiment is concerned, and I feel that I am at liberty to respond to that condition of sentiment and opinion existing here and also in China, and to fall back upon that which we never ought to have abandoned, the right of the people of the United States to exclude Chinese by law from coming into this country.

The Senate of the United States received this declaration from China through the President of the United States as one worthy of consideration. The Senate, without changing it or expressing any disbelief in it, amended the treaty and sent this declaration back to China, which was the clearest and most forcible expression the Senate could give of its belief that China was sincere in making that declaration. Now, I will not stultify myself on this floor by saying that I doubt the sincerity of China in making a declaration of that kind through her minister.

It is not necessary for me to do that for political or any other purposes. There it stands, a solemn recorded declaration, concurred in by the President of the United States and acted upon and concurred in by the Senate of the United States, and returned to China as an understanding between the two Governments that the Chinese Government actually does desire from motives of public policy to prohibit her subjects from coming here. That was the declaration in the treaty. So I think, notwithstanding any suspicions that a very suspecting man may have of the motives of the Chinese government, or any other, I am warranted in holding the Chinese Government up to the record upon this question, holding the President up to it, and the Senate up to it; and that is the actual situation as I regard it.

I repeat that after that situation became known, became disclosed, became thus confirmed, thus acted upon by the Government of China and the President and the Senate of the United States, I have the right to assume, and I do assume, that it is the policy of China that her people shall be prevented from coming here, and I am in favor of legislating in accordance with that policy. I feel that my hands are unfettered by this declaration, and that I have a right now to go back to that ground that we occupied before the negotiation of the Burlingame treaty, which was a free, open right to legislate against the coming of Chinese into the United States. I feel that we are remitted now to that ground, and that we have nothing to do but to make a declaration of a legislative character upon the basis of the declaration made by the Chinese Government that Chinese laborers shall not be permitted to come here. We did not hesitate to do that in respect to the cooly immigration. Where did we get the power to do it? We got it out of our own inherent right of self-defense and our right of government; we got it from the sovereignty of the United States, and nowhere else.

So now we are free, as I understand, to legislate in that direction. It is a mere question of taste whether we shall go along and do it at once or whether we shall delay a little bit and see whether the Chinese will accept the proposition that the Senate of the United States has offered them. I say the Senate of the United States has offered it to them, and I do that very carefully. The President and the Senate both concurring upon a negotiation, the Senate by a vote of two-thirds of its body can make a treaty which the President can afterwards proclaim, which becomes a part of the supreme law of the United States under our Constitution. I suppose that is well enough understood throughout the United States by this time, it has been repeated so frequently.

The President of the United States sent this treaty here as he agreed to it with the Chinese plenipotentiary. The Senate of the United States was not satisfied with it. It put two amendments on it, of greater or less importance or value, according to the differing opinions of Senators upon that subject; but at all events, not being satisfied with it, we refused to ratify it as it had been sent here. There was, therefore, a want of concurrence between the Executive action and the Senatorial action on the treaty as proposed, and no treaty resulted. What was it that resulted? A proposition from the Senate of the United States—not from the President, but from the Senate of the United States—to the Chinese Government sent through the President. It could not be sent through anybody else.

Mr. TELLER. Was it not approved by the President?

Mr. MORGAN. No; he had not anything to do with approving or disapproving.

Mr. TELLER. No treaty will ever pass that is not approved by the President.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will wait a moment he will see that it will not pass, of course; but the question is as to the time when the President has to give it his approval and the manner of giving it.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the President gives his approval after it is ratified by the other government; but does the Senator think the President is under obligation to send to another government for their consideration a treaty he does not intend to approve?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it would be his duty, an act of courtesy to the Senate of the United States. I will not say certainly, but it would be a high constitutional duty for him to submit to a foreign government the propositions that the Senate of the United States might put upon a treaty by way of amendment.

The Senate can not make a treaty as an original negotiation. It can only reach any improvement of a treaty that it desires to make through an amendment which it puts upon the text and then ratifies by a two-thirds vote, and after that ratification it ought to be communicated—we will say it must be communicated—by the President of the United States to the foreign government. That government acts thereupon. Acts upon what? Acts upon the negotiation as proposed by the Senate. The President of the United States has had nothing to do with that negotiation in that shape except merely to transmit it to the foreign government. When the foreign government has ratified it it comes back to the President of the United States, and then arises his opportunity.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose he then declines?

Mr. MORGAN. Then arises his opportunity to say whether or not he will exchange the ratifications with that government of that treaty. And that is the first time when he has had any constitutional connection with the subject. I will illustrate that. I will suppose that the fisheries treaty, which was pending before the Senate for months, had been amended by the Senate in this particular, that in the consideration of our restoring to Great Britain the full and free right of navigation of the Mississippi River, Great Britain would restore to us the full and free right as it existed in 1773 of fishing along the shores of all her northeastern possessions. Suppose the Senate of the United States had put that proposition into that treaty by amendment, the President of the United States would have been bound to have communicated that proposition to Great Britain, for non constat that he is not to be President always.

Great Britain might take time to deliberate upon that until Mr. Harrison should be elected. I think that will be a long while; but that makes no difference. We will suppose it to be a short one and a different man, a different Executive, though filling the same office, might be here at the time that treaty was returned. Would the President of the United States have the right to choke down an amendment put upon a treaty of so important a character as that without submitting it to Great Britain? Certainly not. But when the treaty came back ratified, as we would suppose Great Britain might ratify a treaty of that kind, and the President of the United States was called upon to exchange the ratifications with Great Britain, then his constitutional right to say "No, I will not exchange the ratifications" would make him a party by dissenting to that provision; or if he saw proper to concur with the Senate upon that proposition, then his constitutional right for the first time would arise and could be expressed in a constitutional way by the exchange of ratifications, which would complete the treaty.

Then you would have the concurring action of the President and the Senate of the United States, which before that time could not have existed, unless it might have been by a mere intendment, but no official act, no constitutional act, no legal act would have supervened, through which the President would have committed himself to that treaty—none at all.

I therefore hold, and I think I am entirely correct about it, that the President of the United States is not in the slightest degree responsible for the negotiation that is now pending in the Chinese court. It is the Senate of the United States that made that negotiation, and through the President it was communicated to the Chinese Government, and that is all of it.

Now, it is for the Senate to say whether or not they choose to break down their negotiation. It seems to me that there is no difficulty in the way at all, for the legislative Senate, acting in concurrence with the legislative House of Representatives, has the right to overrule and ride down the action of this body, proposing a negotiation, though it is done by a two-thirds vote of this body. There is no doubt about that.

The Senate of the United States owes it to China, if it has changed its mind upon this question, right now to notify that Government that that negotiation with the Senate of the United States, not with the President of the United States, which is now pending before the Chinese Government, is hereby withdrawn and recalled, so that that Government will have no surprise inflicted upon it. I believe it is the duty of the Senate to-day to proceed to give notice that that proposed negotiation which is now being conducted through the President of the United States with China has been recalled henceforth and forever as to the Chinese Government.

I intend to stand upon the doctrine of the sovereign right of the people of the United States to exclude Chinese of any class or quality that they see proper to exclude, and I put it distinctly again upon the ground of national self-defense. Nevertheless, the pending bill ought to be amended. It ought to contain the provisions of the bill that I have just had the honor of submitting and having read to this body, for we ought to satisfy China for the purpose of preventing her taking unnecessary umbrage at us, through which our commercial relations with that country may be seriously interrupted, that we have every feeling of kindliness and regard for her people that is expressed in this fifth article of the treaty which the Senate sent back to China without any dissent at all. That contains the provision for the payment of $276,619.75, that being the sum of money claimed by the Chinese Government for alleged injuries and actual injury—for there is no doubt about it—to her people which we were unable to control in consequence of the very great distance that these things occurred from the center of civil power in the United States.

I give this statement and one other fact as my reason for intending this morning to vote for a reconsideration of the bill under consideration for some days past, in order that it may go to the committee, or, at least, in order that the Senate may receive and act upon the amendment which I have proposed contained in the bill just read.

The other point is this: The Chinese are pouring into us here from the British possessions, and we have no means of preventing it. The twelfth section of the act of 1882, carrying into effect the treaty of 1880, if Senators will examine it, they will find it contains a provision that a Chinaman when he comes in contrary to the treaty is to be returned to the country whence he came. He comes into the British possessions and pays $50 head-money for getting inside the line. Then he comes over into Washington Territory, down to Oregon, and down to California, or anywhere else.

What are we to do? All we can do is to seize that man, proceed against him by indictment or information, for violating the immigration laws, and lock him up in the penitentiary for a brief term, six months or a year, or whatever the term is. We feed him there and do better by him than he can do for himself; he gets fat, and by the time his term of imprisonment has expired he is turned loose on the community, and that is all you can do, because you must send him back to the country from whence he came. He came from the British possessions and you can not get him back without paying $50 head-money. They have tried to see whether that would work or not, paying $50 head-money to the local government there. That would not work.

Now what ought we to do? The act of 1882 ought to be amended in the twelfth section so as to say that we shall return the Chinaman to the country from which he came or to China; and then after he has come here and undergone his punishment we could ship him off under our own statute to China and thereby get rid of him. But as it is, the first door that is open is the door into the British possessions with a demand of $50 a head. The next door that is open is the door of the penitentiary, and after the man has been there six months or twelve months then the Chinese are poured out upon that country with the additional grace of having been locked up in the penitentiary with other convicts for perhaps six or twelve months.

The system does not work, and while we are at this matter this morning we ought to get down to the bottom of it and that provision of law ought to be changed, so that when one of these Chinese comes into the United States from the British possessions we can take him and send him back to China and not to the country whence he came.

Mr. STEWART. Can we not pass a law of that kind now? Several bills of that kind have been introduced.

Mr. MORGAN. I say to the Senator from Nevada there is no danger about the passage of this bill. Everybody in the Senate wants this bill passed.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that is true.

Mr. MORGAN. There are 95 per cent. of Senators who want it passed. If I felt that I was imperiling its passage I would not do what I am now proposing; but I am quite sure, after all the votes given here, that if the bill goes to the proper committee, or if it does not, if it is amended in the Senate, we can make it a much more perfect bill than it is, a much more available and useful bill than it is. The bill is exactly in the line of policy I advocate, and I want to do the best I can. I move the reference of the measure I have introduced to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been twice read, if there be no objection, the bill will be referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to be heard on that question.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the bill will not be referred until the Senator from Oregon shall have had a chance to make an explanation.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to present the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 32, 33, and 35 to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 33.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph, being lines 3 to 8, both inclusive, on page 16 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the 225 acres of land on the Hudson River, directly south of the military reservation at West Point, belonging to the estate of Edward V. Kinsley, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary for the purposes of the Military Academy, and to receive offers for the sale of their interest in such land from such of the heirs of said Kinsley as are competent and willing to sell such interests; and the Secretary of War is authorized to submit all offers so made and the question of the value of said 225 acres to a board, to consist of the Superintendent of the Military Academy and two competent civilians, who shall make due investigation and report concerning said value; and the Secretary of War shall submit said offers and the report of said board, with his opinion, to Congress at its next session. The expenses of said board and compensation at the rate of $10 a day, for not more than ten days for each of the civilian members, shall be paid from the appropriation for contingencies of the Army."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
LEVI MAISH,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, one word in explanation of the report. The amendments on which this conference was held were inserted by the Senate under the belief that at this session no fortification bill was likely to pass, for at the time of their insertion the fortification bill had not been reported to the other House. Since that time the fortification bill has passed and been agreed to, so that our amendments to the Army bill are substantially provided for.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact, as I understood the report when it was being read, that there are two civilians to be appointed in addition to the Superintendent of the Military Academy, but nowhere did I hear any provision by whom they were to be appointed.

Mr. ALLISON. By the Secretary of War. I will say that that relates to the purchase of property adjacent to the West Point Academy and was inserted in the bill by the Senate, but it was covered in as a general amendment with the fortification provisions, and therefore had to be taken out and reinserted in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

DAMAGES TO CHINESE SUBJECTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to say a few words in response to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon can take the floor on this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] for years past, until within the last seven days, has been the devoted champion in the Senate of the sanctity of treaty rights. In season and out of season, in committee and in the Senate, he has sought to denounce, and has denounced, various propositions that have been brought to the attention of the Senate by members of this body looking to the exclusion of Chinese from this country. He has insisted first, last, and all the time that that was a question to be settled by diplomacy and by treaty stipulation. He referred to a measure such as the one now pending in the Senate, looking to the exclusion of Chinese laborers, when being discussed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] some time ago, as "the Colorado notion," as "the Colorado idea."

He has time and again denounced bills which have been brought here and advocated by Republican Senators looking to the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country as "the Pacific-coast idea," as "the Oregon idea," as propositions brought forward and pressed by demagogues for demagogical purposes and for party objects. That has been the line of Senatorial conduct on the part of the Senator from Alabama in reference to this question of Chinese exclusion.

But lo, and behold! when a Democratic House of Representatives introduces and in one day, without a reference to a committee, passes a Chinese exclusion bill, that, according to the admission of the Senator from Alabama, is in direct contravention of material provisions of existing treaties between this country and China, the Senator from Alabama vaults clear over the fence, turns around, and says he is in favor of that bill, and he absolutely votes for it, as he did the other day, if I am not wrong in my recollection, going back on the whole record of his life in the Senate on that question, doubling on himself, repudiating everything he had ever said and all that he had ever advocated upon the subject; turns around and takes a position here in the Senate, not only by his vote, but by his speech, in favor of the passage at once through the Senate of a total exclusion bill, in so far as the Chinese in this country are concerned, and a bill which he himself stated in that speech was a direct repeal of the existing treaties with China.

This morning he comes into the Senate and takes another turn and insists that the bill for which he voted last Friday shall be amended. He desires to go back on what he did on Friday last. He proposes to recall, if I understand him, his vote on last Friday, and vote for a reconsideration of what was done last Friday, in order that he may take another position and a different position from the one occupied last Friday—a different position, perhaps, from any that he has ever occupied heretofore.

That is the record of the Senator from Alabama on the Chinese question in the Senate, and it does not lie in his mouth to be questioning, as he has questioned time and again, the sincerity of the Senator from Oregon upon this question, and the sincerity of the representatives from the Pacific coast upon this question, and the sincerity of the great mass of the people of the Pacific coast upon this question. A Senator with that kind of a record is not in a position to question the sincerity of Senators on this floor.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the exclusion of Chinese, laying aside informally the pending business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside. Before submitting that request the Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the request of the Senator from Nevada requires unanimous consent, I respectfully object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the request the Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Chinese exclusion bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him, the title of which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the purpose of appealing to the Senator from Nevada to withhold his request or motion, whichever he may elect to make, in order that I may ask the Senator in charge of the unfinished business and the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, which is in fact an appropriation bill, and which as such, having always been recognized as such, is entitled to the right of way. It is a bill not involving a very large amount, but in which a great many people are interested, and I am confident that it can not take an hour, I do not think it will take more than half an hour, to dispose of it. I shall be greatly obliged if the Senate will consider it at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I am in favor of that bill, but I can not consent to its consideration now. I insist on my motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator move to take up the Chinese bill or does he ask unanimous consent?

Mr. STEWART. I move, because there is objection made, and so I can not do otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS. Has there been objection?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was asked and objection was made.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the bill, the title of which has been reported by the Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair if that is a debatable question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the question of proceeding to the consideration of a bill is not debatable.

Mr. VEST. Let us take it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make some observations upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 21, noes not counted.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Ohio asks me to withdraw that motion that he may submit some remarks, and as I have done that for everybody who wanted to talk I feel that I must do it for him. Therefore I withdraw the motion, and I shall renew it at a later time.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry about which I have no doubt myself.

If the Senate shall reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] who made the motion to reconsider connecting with it the declaration of his purpose to offer a certain amendment which he had read, it would be quite in order, would it not, if the bill be reconsidered, to move to commit it to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HARRIS. I asked the question in order that there should be no misunderstanding about it if the vote be reconsidered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, having already early in this debate expressed my strong desire to vote for the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country, and believing that this bill if it stood alone, without any connection with the treaty with China recently pending in the Senate, would be a wise bill, I yet appeal to Senators on both sides of the Chamber, for considerations of national honor which ought always first to be heeded on any question that is presented to us, that they allow the bill to stand in its present position until we can ascertain whether or not the treaty now pending between the two nations will be ratified. That is my only desire. If this bill is allowed to remain in its present position and it shall turn out that this treaty will not be ratified and that the Chinese Government has taken ground against the ratification of the treaty, then I should be willing to vote and I would vote with pleasure for the passage of this bill; but pending that question I submit as a matter of national honor whether it is right and proper for us to seek to nullify a treaty that is now being considered by a friendly nation, a treaty that has been ratified by this body, to which we have committed ourselves in every possible way—whether it is right at this stage of the proceedings to proceed to nullify and abrogate not only all existing treaties with China, but the treaty at present pending between these two nations? I frankly say that if our position was reversed, and Great Britain were thus to act towards the American people, I would without hesitation vote for a declaration of non-intercourse or war.

It is a departure from all the usages of civilized nations. It is a departure from all considerations of national honor. No man believes that the House of Representatives would have passed this bill except upon the supposition that the treaty had been rejected by China. It was understood in that House at the time it was passed that the Chinese Government had refused to ratify the treaty, or it would not have passed. I can assume that but for that supposed fact the bill could not have passed the House of Representatives. It came to us here; and but for the general idea that the treaty had been rejected by China the bill would surely have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and taken the ordinary course prescribed by our rules for the consideration of public measures. There is no doubt about that.

Early in the debate I said that my action and my neglect to make the ordinary motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations was based on the idea that I then assumed to be accurate and correct, that the President of the United States had information that this treaty would not be ratified, and therefore that the Congress of the United States would be at liberty to proceed upon that basis. Proceeding upon that basis I was willing that Congress should by law put an end to this whole system of Chinese immigration.

But since that time the condition has changed. We are informed officially by the President of the United States that this treaty is still under consideration. We are informed from other sources, of which there can be no question, that the Chinese minister is now on his way to this country for the purpose of either conveying to us intelligence that it has been ratified or that it has not been ratified.

Mr. TELLER. I would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Chinese minister has not been to China since this treaty was made.

Mr. SHERMAN. He has been in Peru in the execution of his duty, and he must be undoubtedly in communication with his government either in Peru or here by telegram. There can be no question about that.

Now, I ask you, is it right to deal with a nation great or small—the argument would be just as strong with a nation of one hundred thousand as with a nation of three hundred million people—is it right, honorable, just, proper for us suddenly, with full information now that the treaty is being still considered by the Chinese Government, not only to nullify the treaty that we have just proposed to make, but to nullify all the treaties that exist between China and the United States, because if we violate or abrogate any portion of any of these treaties it is by the law of nations, at the will of the other party, an abrogation of all treaties. The Chinese Government might at once with great propriety and according to the system of civilized nations, upon our refusing to observe existing treaties or seeking to abrogate any provision of any of these treaties, declare that all the treaties are null and void. There is no question about that.

This situation has already excited the conservative mind of the people of the United States. They have not gone crazy on this question. They do not want anything done to China that would not be done to any other nation. We have all proceeded on the principle that the Chinese Government is one to be treated according to the laws of civilized nations. We boasted when we made our first treaty with China that we had broken down the barrier of three thousand years of prejudice and seclusion, and we believed that in accomplishing that we had done a great good for our country, opened to us avenues of new commerce, and the result of the opening of such communication has been that we have developed an enormous trade with China not only of imports but of exports. Now is it wise for us to put ourselves in a position where the Chinese Government might with great propriety and with proper regard to established usages put an end entirely to all our treaty relations and all our commercial relations with that great country?

We do no harm in postponing this treaty from day to day. The gentlemen from the Pacific coast ought to remember that they are but a part of this country, and while their voice on this question is potent, and we are willing to follow them and have followed them without regard to party lines and local distinctions, have followed them to extreme measures for the exclusion of all laborers of the Chinese race, and propose to follow them still further, yet we do insist as the representatives of a law-abiding and law-governing people that this proceeding shall be in an orderly manner, and that no undue or unnatural or unusual course should be taken in dealing with the Chinese Government. Therefore I appeal to Senators to let this matter stand as it is. It is safe in the hands of the Senate of the United States. The bill has passed the House of Representatives, and we can pass it any day. The Senate can act in a day; any Senator can make a motion to proceed to its consideration when we know whether or not the treaty has been acted upon.

Suppose the treaty is ratified by China, the President of the United States can not with propriety in the face of this law if it pass exchange the ratifications, and the treaty does not take effect until these ratifications are exchanged. The ratification of a treaty is precisely the same as the appointment of an officer. We may approve an appointment and then the President may withhold the commission. That is settled by one of the oldest decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. This treaty is still pending and not yet ratified by the contracting parties. If we pass this bill and make it a law we nullify the treaty, a treaty that we ourselves ratified. We can not do that consistently with national honor, unless for some flagrant act or cause; it would not be a good example to set to the nations of the world.

Therefore I, speaking as the chairman of the committee here charged with this matter, a committee bound to see that our treaty obligations and our friendly relations with all nations are observed according to their usual order—I appear as one of the members of that committee to object to this exceptional course when there is no occasion for it, as this bill is under the power of the Senate, and on a mere motion when we have full information may be enacted into a law when the President shall sign it.

Suppose this bill is sent to the President of the United States. I do not for a moment suppose that any Senator here wants to play a mere political game and put the President in an embarrassing position in dealing with foreign nations, or as has been expressed elsewhere put him in a hole. How can he say, or how could any man say, whether this bill ought to be approved until he knows what is done with the treaty? Suppose he is called upon to approve the bill sent to him in the face of his declaration that the treaty is still pending between the two nations; do you expect him to sign that bill and thus put an end to our relations with China? If he does not do it, he may be embarrassed by grave political considerations affecting his party and his country. We do not care for him or for his success on this side of the Chamber, but we do care if it also affects the national honor, for this we are bound to consider on both sides and by every Senator.

Therefore, I appeal to the Senator from Nevada and the gentlemen who agree with him, not that I expect them to vote against this bill or to change their opinion, but that they allow it to take its due course and await the result of the action already had on the treaty. If that should not be carried into full execution by the ratification of the treaty, which not only provides for cutting off all Chinese immigration hereafter, but also provides for excluding even Chinamen holding our certificates in foreign countries from returning to the United States, a treaty that goes to the full length of this law—then it seems to me is the time to pass this bill, and until then we ought not to take one single step further.

For these reasons if I stood here alone I would demand and insist that this bill should remain until the treaty is disposed of. There should be no child's play, no party tactics or undue haste in dealing with our treaty relations with foreign nations. When we offered the Chinese Government a treaty we offered it in good faith, proposing to cut off all Chinese immigration and to pay them a large sum of money for injuries that were done to Chinese subjects. If you defeat the treaty by this law, you make no provisions such as by the unanimous vote of the Senate were held to be necessary and proper to give to the Chinese Government compensation for injuries done to Chinese people in this country. You defeat the treaty and pass a law and thus revoke an appropriation that has been made already to pay the Chinese Government for the injuries done to Chinese subjects.

Why not let it rest? There is no reason, and I appeal to Senators on both sides to do so. Remember now that this is not a question of Chinese exclusion; it is not a question that affects the Chinaman in this country or outside of this country, or the Chinese people, but it is a question whether the Senate of the United States, the conservative guardian of all the great interests of this country, will suddenly and rashly in the face of the information we now have abrogate a treaty which we have only recently ratified, and do it summarily without any of the necessary provisions needed to accompany it.

I say I will not do it, and I trust the Senators on both sides will see that it is not done. I am bound to say that a large majority on the other side of the Chamber, although they probably are in favor of Chinese exclusion as strongly as the Senator from Nevada, yet they have seen the bearing of this question upon national honor, and I will not be behind them in standing by the good faith of this nation in dealing with China as well as with every other nation and with all the peoples of the world.

I can not conscientiously, with my view of public duty, see here a gross, obvious breach of the treaty with a foreign nation made suddenly upon statement of facts that do not exist. I would not do it for the world, although I am willing to do anything that is proper and necessary to carry out the object of those gentlemen who are pressing this bill so strongly. While their people, no doubt, feel keenly the necessity of stopping Chinese immigration, I think they ought to be willing to await the ordinary course of events. They were well satisfied with the treaty that was made here the other day. All their papers, so far as I saw, and all their Senators, I believe every one of them, voted for it, including the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TELLER. I always enter a disclaimer when that statement is made. I voted against it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I never voted for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is certain that the great body of the Senate voted for it. It is therefore an obligation resting upon every one, on the two-thirds and more than two-thirds who voted to ratify the treaty.

I supposed the Senators all voted for it, but they say not. That is the end of it.

Mr. STEWART. I voted for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nevada says he voted for it, and I know myself, from having reported the treaty, that it was based upon the representations of the Pacific coast. Senators from the Pacific coast came before the Committee on Foreign Relations and insisted that the treaty as sent to us was not sufficient, that it might be evaded by technical reasoning, and they therefore asked and demanded of us the very amendments that were proposed to the treaty, every one of them concurring of both political parties. That treaty having the sanction of the Senate and the approval of the Senators from the Pacific coast, was ratified and sent to the President, and the President has done his duty in trying to secure the ratification of the Chinese Government. Before the Government of China has had in due course the opportunity of acting upon it, it is proposed that we should abrogate this and all other treaties.

Sometimes it has been said, it has been said here to-day, that the Chinese are too slow about this. There are 8,000 miles between us. Telegraphic communication is not always to be had and is very unsatisfactory. Here is a peculiar nation, a peculiar government with a great deal of form and red tape. Suppose they should take a little longer time than we deem necessary. They have not, indeed, taken as much time as the Senate of the United States took to consider any one of a dozen treaties that have been ratified at the present session. In some cases we have ratified treaties that have lain on our tables two years; and now because the Chinese Government has not promptly come up to the extreme measure contained in the recent treaty we will give them no longer time, they have had enough time, and therefore we will go to work and abolish and abrogate all our treaties with them.

It will not do. It is not consistent with good faith, with national honor, and therefore I insist upon it so far as my vote will go and my voice can go that this bill remain here in the position in which it is, the most favorable possible, when a single vote can at any moment pass it, until we know whether or not the treaty we have sent them has been ratified.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very much gratified by the remarks that have fallen from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. When this bill came into the Senate a few days ago my first impulse was, as the RECORD shows, to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I made a motion to that effect. I withdrew it only after the failure on the part of the Senator from Ohio and every other member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who was present, and every other member of the Senate who was present, to put in one word in favor of that motion. The bill had not been printed then. I did not understand its contents, for it is very difficult sometimes to catch the full meaning of a legal document by simply hearing it read at the Clerk's desk. It has been printed since. I have looked into this matter a little, and I am as well satisfied as I am of any proposition that was ever submitted to my mind that the undue haste—I might use another expression and be well justified in using it—that the undue race, the contest for swiftness and haste between the two opposing sides of this Chamber looking to the vote of the Pacific coast in the Presidential election should not have intervened.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. In regard to this bill involving, as the Senator from Ohio justly and wisely said, the national honor, if it had not been for those circumstances, this undue haste, this unseemly contest would not have occurred.

Mr. President, on the 7th day of May last, just four months ago, this body in executive session, by a vote of more than two-thirds of those present, ratified the treaty now pending before the Emperor of China. In making that ratification we saw proper to put on two amendments, which amendments, in my regard, do not change the sense or meaning of the treaty at all, but they were amendments, and we having exercised the power of amendment thereby notified the Chinese Government that the treaty as amended met our entire approbation.

There is no provision in that treaty, as there is in some, that there should be an exchange of ratifications of the treaty within any specific period; so that, according to the terms of the treaty itself, either party was entitled to take just such time to act upon it as in its own judgment it saw proper, and, as the Senator from Ohio well remarked, in cases of this sort there is no technical rule of limitation which requires haste upon the part of a government; that we ourselves in deliberating upon solemn treaties and solemn contracts with other nations have even taken as much as two years in which to come to a final conclusion.

I had the curiosity when I thought of this Empire of China with all of its singular attributes as a nation, as alluded to by the Senator from Ohio, to see what had been the course of China in reference to her other treaties which we had made with her. I find that the first treaty we ever made with China was concluded on the 3d day of July, 1844. It was proclaimed by the President of the United States immediately after the exchange of ratifications of the treaty, on the 18th day of April, 1846, nearly two years occurring between the signing of the treaty and its coming into effect as a bargain between the two countries. I find in reference to the treaty of 1858 that it was concluded on the 18th day of June, 1858, and it was proclaimed by the President of the United States as a treaty on the 26th day of January, 1860.

Thus our prior intercourse with China, our knowledge of the red-tape, of the delays, and so on which occur in that country with reference to the ratifications of treaties, and especially treaties with us, notified us that there would be delay, and in the instances which I have mentioned there were delays of nearly two years; and as to this treaty there has been a delay, not from its conclusion, or from its ratification by the Senate with amendments, but from its original negotiation of about seven months.

Now, Mr. President, I put it to every Senator here present when we have thus made a treaty with China, by which we acquired valuable rights, by which we acquired by her consent a release from a most onerous obligation that had been imposed on us by the treaty of 1868, when we had deliberated upon that treaty, when we had amended it so as to make it suit us exactly, without consulting China or her minister with reference to the amendments, is it consistent with that high notion of national honor which should characterize the Government of this great country? You may call China barbarian or semi-civilized and all that sort of thing. Possibly it is; but, sir, national honor, the pledge of national faith is just as binding upon us whether it be made to the greatest, the grandest, and the most civilized nation in the world, or whether it be made to China.

For these reasons and for the reasons so well expressed by the Senator from Ohio I hope that this body, the conservative force in our politics, the guardian, made so by the Constitution, of treaties and treaty rights and treaty obligations with other countries, will not with undue haste proceed to the passage of a bill which no man denies, which no man can deny, is plainly, openly, flagrantly in violation of a treaty which we have made with that empire. This violation is not a matter of argument, as was in the case of the law of 1882, but our treaties with China expressly state that, whilst we may suspend and limit the immigration of Chinese laborers, we shall not prohibit it. This does prohibit it.

What are we to do? We have made a treaty with China very recently, in which more than two-thirds of this body concurred, and, as the Senator from Ohio stated, it was made in accordance with the wishes and the declarations and the representations of the Senators from the Pacific coast, made by them to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Now in seven months, when we have heretofore waited nearly two years before any treaty with China could be consummated, in hot haste we come and violate the treaty.

I want to allude to another remark made by the Senator from Ohio for the purpose, if my poor powers can accomplish such a thing, of enforcing the view presented by that Senator. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to these treaties. The treaty of 1868 and the subsequent treaty of 1880 are but additions to the treaty of 1858, which is a substitute for the treaty of 1844. They therefore become a part of the treaty of 1858, and if we abrogate it, it is abrogated entirely. There is no such thing as a partial abrogation of a treaty, except by the consent of the two contracting parties. Then that is not called abrogation, but a change of the treaty by mutual consent. Every article in a treaty, every stipulation in a treaty is the condition of every other article and of every other stipulation.

If you take away one, it being the condition of all the others, then you destroy the whole; and then what becomes of your commerce with China? For without the treaty of 1858, which, as I said just now, was a substitute for the treaty of 1844, you have no right to put an American vessel within any port in China; you have no right to claim that any American merchant or any American missionary shall put his foot upon the soil of China. And suppose China should claim, as she has a right to claim, that "as you have abrogated your contract with us whilst there was pending before you and before us a proposition to change these treaties in accordance with your wishes"—suppose she should say to us, "as you would not allow time for the consideration of it, but you made haste to destroy the treaties so far as they were binding upon you, we accept the proposition made by yourselves, to treat all the treaties as null and void."

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote with as much pleasure as I ever cast a vote in my life, I shall vote because I believe it to be my duty to do it, to reconsider this measure and refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, my absence from the sessions of the Senate during the whole period that this matter of Chinese immigration has been before the two Houses of Congress finds me now with the first opportunity to express my views in regard to the pending bill.

This pending bill has as many relations to the great interests of this country as almost any single bill presented could have. In the first place, it is for the first time in the diplomatic history of this country an intervention by legislative action while there was a treaty negotiated by this Government in all its constitutional forms pending for adoption by a foreign nation, and this intervention not only rebukes and repeals our action in that diplomatic conduct of affairs, but it immediately and absolutely affronts the foreign nation with the suggestion that we will no longer tolerate any such method of dealing with the matter between us.

That, Mr. President, when once stated, seems to me a sufficient reason why in this body a bill of that kind should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

But this bill has relations not to the uncompleted treaty alone, but has relations to all the existing treaty arrangements between us and China; and China is our great friend, always looking to this nation to stand for justice to a non-Christian country when she could not expect it from any European power; and yet no European power, with its rude oppressions of China in the interests of its trade, has ever undertaken to present to that great nation and that dignified and sensitive Government a proposition of this kind.

I will first say a word in regard to the present condition of the treaty which so recently received the almost unanimous support of this body.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has introduced, it seems to me, quite a novelty into our treaty-making power. There is but one treaty-making power representing this country, and towards foreign nations it is strictly true. Though the forms of our Constitution divide responsibility and require concurrence, yet as towards those nations there is but one treaty-making power here. That treaty-making power is in the Executive as our representative, and wholly our representative, toward every foreign nation. He has the complete authority to negotiate and approve and agree to, so far as the foreign nation is concerned, and so far as the commitment of the executive authority is concerned, merely to negotiate a treaty; but it is a part of our Constitution, and so known and understood diplomatically abroad, that the Senate must give its advice and consent in concurrence with the executed will of the Executive in respect to a treaty or this Government is not bound.

Now, this Senate has passed through that stage of internal and divided authority, and has placed in the President's hands a treaty of his negotiation, which we have approved with some amendments that we have appended. It was quite competent for the President of the United States, having received this qualified approval, advice, and consent to have relinquished the negotiation then and abandoned it. The qualifications of the Senate might seem to the President unsuitable to the negotiation and to the proposed treaty, and then it would have been a res infecta between the countries and neither could take offense; but the moment the President of the United States, taking the treaty with these modifications and our approval, sends it forward for the consideration of the foreign government, then absolutely and completely the whole treaty-making power of this country is presented and engaged for its deliberation and assent.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him just there whether after the President has done that he still has not the right under the Constitution to refuse to exchange ratifications?

Mr. EVARTS. That is a question that will come after I get through with what I am now saying. It does not affect in the least the proposition that I now make.

The Senator from Alabama seems to think that this is a Senate treaty, the Executive treaty having failed between us and China, and the Senate treaty is now under consideration before the Emperor of China. There is no other way to make a treaty with this part of the treaty-making power. It has made one with the President and another treaty comes out of that agreement, and now the question is whether they will come to an agreement with this body while it all remains res infecta. Then the President, after it comes back again, can say, "Well, you have agreed to the Senate's treaty, but not to my treaty, and I do not agree to the Senate's treaty."

I submit, sir, to the further consideration of the Senator from Alabama, that when the President of the United States communicates a treaty that has received amendments for the consideration of the foreign power, the President accepts our amendments as a part of his negotiations, and the further proceeding is wholly with the foreign power having engaged to it in this form, both the Senate's concurrence and the Executive's desire and design and engagement.

Well, now, the Senator asks a question shedding no light upon the proposition I have laid down, which is perfectly clear and perfectly intelligible and can receive a direct answer. After this engagement thus presented, if the Chinese Empire declines concurrence, there is no treaty. If the Chinese Government accedes to the modified treaty, then that Government is engaged to this Government in the completion of this treaty, but there is no completion between nations of any treaty until ratifications are exchanged, and it is quite competent for either nation to proceed no further, and then the treaty fails; but it is in the nature of a post hdc consideration, and there may be grave, interesting, and valuable reasons that prevent an exchange of ratifications.

There may occur changes of opinion, changes of interest, and caprice, if you please, of a domestic motive and a domestic application that will incline a government not to exchange ratifications. Sometimes a President may consider it for the welfare of the country to refuse a ratification; sometimes, when the government have committed themselves thus fully, they may regard that refusal on his part as not consistent with his duty to the country though it is within his power; but when ratifications are not exchanged then there is no treaty. There is no difficulty about that.

But here the transaction is of a legislative power intervening, interrupting, preventing the courtesy and amity and equality between nations, which thus rudely interrupts the action of the foreign power without any public reason having arisen whatever; and the foreign nation thus interrupted in deliberation over what apparently was a sincere and deliberate proposition of treaty is notified "we prefer to take into our own law the changes in your treaties that we had held out to you might be accomplished with your concurrence and with the preservation of amity and mutual respect;" and the foreign nation, whether it be feeble or great, whether it be connected with our European system of civilization and of commerce, or whether it confronts us as the great Asiatic power and the great Asiatic industry that confronts us across the Pacific sea, with being a great commercial Pacific Ocean nation nearer to the Orient and the Ind, that has been sought and followed after for the wealth to be gained from it for a thousand years.

What, then, is there in our past relations that would thus be rudely jostled if they be not actually abrogated and annulled? They were of the most friendly nature. There has not been an approach that this Government has made to China in our domestic interests, in the questions of our polity, the questions of our naturalization, and the questions of immigration, that the great nation confronting us has not met us in the most conciliatory and the most yielding attitude.

We made a treaty of great importance, ratified and concluded by an exchange of ratifications in 1859, by which a vast improvement was made in our relations with China; and it took the place of the former somewhat fragmentary condition in which we stood to them. Everything there was of concession and of advantage to our trade, our citizens, our religious faith, our missionaries; and yet every one of these concessions and arrangements was a departure from the settled polity and policy of thousands of years. Let me ask attention to the general nature, which I find alluded to in a message from President Hayes to the Congress when the question of the abrogation of treaties in 1879 was up:

> The principal treaty, of which the ratifications were exchanged August 16, 1859 recites that the "United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire, desiring to maintain firm, lasting, and sincere friendship, have resolved to renew, in a manner clear and positive, by means of a treaty or general convention of peace, amity, and commerce, the rules of which shall in future be mutually observed in the intercourse of their respective countries," and proceeds, in its thirty articles, to lay out a careful and comprehensive system for the commercial relations of our people with China. The main substance of all the provisions of this treaty is to define and secure the rights of our people in respect of access to, residence and protection in, and trade with China. The actual provisions in our favor, in these respects, were framed to be, and have been found to be, adequate and appropriate to the interests of our commerce, and by the concluding article we receive the important guaranty "that should at any time the Ta Tsing Empire grant to any nation, or the merchants or citizens of any nation, any right, privilege, or favor connected either with navigation, commerce, political or other intercourse which is not conferred by this treaty, such right, privilege, and favor shall at once freely inure to the benefit of the United States, its public officers, merchants, and citizens." Against this body of stipulations in our favor, and this permanent engagement of equality in respect of all future concessions to foreign nations, the general promise of permanent peace and good offices on our part seems to be the only equivalent. For this the first article undertakes as follows: "There shall be, as there have always been, peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Ta Tsing Empire, and between their people respectively. They shall not insult or oppress each other for any trifling cause, so as to produce an estrangement between them; and if any other nation should act unjustly or oppressively, the United States will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the question, thus showing their friendly feelings."

That is our treaty. How many Chinese subjects were in this nation on the Pacific coast at the date of that ratification? Two hundred thousand of them; and no question was raised by us. No point, no clause, no phrase was introduced to show that these our promises, not to our friends, did not cover, with our eyes open and in our actual condition of immigration, our obligation.

What happened next? The treaty of 1868, or the Burlingame treaty, a treaty given us also by our desire, enlarged for our then present occasion the introduction of these laborers from China; and when it was found that this, although but a temporary motive seemed to justify it, yet introduced a foreign element, incapable of ingratiation with our race, with our Government, and when we desired a reconsideration under these proper and just necessities, as we regarded them, we were met in the same spirit, and there was no guard, no restriction in the freedom of their concession as to the abrogation of that treaty except a due protection of those who were here under our invitation.

Mr. President, I have no occasion to find it necessary to yield anything on the question of opposition to the immigration of the Chinese. I heartily agreed in the position as it then arose in 1879 that we should be the masters again of the question of immigration from China, and on the highest considerations and without hesitation I espoused the measures that led to the exclusion. But not then and not now will my desire and my convictions that we should not entertain this foreign race as a part of our population lead me to flout our obligations by treaty.

It became my duty to give advice to the President as to whether the bill that had then passed both Houses by great majorities was consistent with the duty of this Government to its treaties, its public faith, and its honor; and to show how quickly even in the very minds and in the very votes a measure can be rushed upon a provocation and an excitement, of a public nature to be sure, but yet not as deliberative and as cool as it should be, when the President's veto was read in the House of Representatives, where the bill had passed 155 to 95, there was but a vote of 110 against 96 to pass the bill over the veto. It did not reappear in the Senate by its being thus disposed of constitutionally in the other House. But immediately the Government undertook to negotiate a treaty that should absolve us from the obligations of the Burlingame treaty. Let me call attention to that treaty for a moment, for its brevity, for its completely executing the purpose in its prospective treatment:

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

The future legislation that was to execute this conceded privilege of absolving us from the obligations of the Burlingame treaty contained this very proper provision, as it seems to me, as it seemed to me then, and as it seemed to the Senate in approving the treaty as negotiated:

The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United minister at Peking and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

Of course the nations dealing with us in amity always raise any question of our legislation that seems oppressive and contrary to amity. But this polite nation was not willing to put itself in the position, after it had parted with the principal power, to be considered as harping or criticising without a reservation of that right, so that acting in the dark, so to speak, without the legislation before it, it might have this privilege of questioning between the nations, not the validity, for it had parted with the power, but the propriety of the legislation.

On the same day with that treaty we made a supplementary treaty to the commercial treaty of 1858, and therein we were elevated in the judgment of that power far above every foreign nation with whom it had ever dealt. If there be a sincere, a humane, a benevolent purpose on the part of the Chinese Government towards their subjects, it is to save them from the horrors of the opium habit and the destruction of character, of health, and of life; and every nation immersed in trade has carried its point always by evasion, by browbeating, and finally, at last by England, by war to keep up and insist upon the trade.

But now for the first time this Christian nation of ours, dealing with this non-Christian nation, undertook to cut ourselves loose from the Western proposition that these nations were all to be treated as subordinate and subject to our trade and our purposes of trade, by providing either for an obligation on our part to see to it that our citizens did not engage in the importation of opium into China against its laws, or by its commerce or its navigation within its own waters aid in transporting from place to place within it, giving us also on our part by this treaty certain serious and practical advantages in our trade and engagements with China of a domestic nature within that territory. That put us at once upon two propositions, that is, is this country as ready to make its treaties with a non-Christian power as a Christian power in weaving around Japan and China a web of interference with their domestic affairs and with their freedom in their customs regulations? If we found ourselves subject to regulations onerous and intolerable, we submitted always to them, having reason and justice and friendly consideration adequate to relieve us. Then on her part she has found this great, humane, benevolent engagement on our part and that for it we were on the side of the humane domestic legislation of China against the greed of all the trade of all the nations, including our own.

Those are the treaties, superadded to the common and free arrangements of the treaty of 1858. What does this legislation do with those treaties? Upon looking at this bill I am not so sure that it should be treated as an abrogation of the treaties, but it is an absolute violation. The bill does not convey to the Government authority to denounce the treaty of 1880 or to denounce any sections of that treaty. The former bill as it came up from the other House in 1879 was substantially of the same nature, though rather covert, with what is now proposed to be done in this bill, though that was done upon the Burlingame treaty, and not after the treaty that we made in 1880, which was supposed to be satisfactory to us. But in the Senate a section was added which directed the President to communicate to the Chinese Government the abrogation of the fourth and fifth sections of the existing treaty. Then the question arose directly for the President to consider and for me to advise, and it seemed to me very clear that the Burlingame treaty was imbedded in the treaty of 1858 in its own terms, and there could be no possibility of dislocating any denunciation of a part of the Burlingame treaty that did not carry down the whole; that is to say, that did not in the conception and intelligence and interest of the Chinese Government, without any denunciation by itself of any portion of those treaties, regard it as a denunciation of the whole fabric.

It is well to talk about a denunciation of a treaty as being something that is within a permission or a right, but a denunciation of a treaty is a violation of a treaty. That is all that it is. If there is no reserved right of denunciation, then it is a violation of that treaty, and of its terms and of its duration; and it leaves to the foreign government the right to put its own construction, if it be consistent with our action and be equivalent to a rupture of our relations, to justify such methods of resistance and resentment as it sees fit.

While we were talking only, and thinking, and the legislation was proposed in 1879 with these modifications and denunciations of the treaty, the whole fabric of the protection of our citizens, of our commercial or Christian civilization and its purposes, were at the mercy of China as by a blow, if we should have passed that bill. If we had desired or expected that tolerance, deliberation, humanity should govern that nation towards our commerce and our citizens, it would not be by expecting it from the lessons that we taught them; it must have been from some non-Christian example that they would have found that forbearance and that humanity, and not in this Christian nation that had dealt with it. But in the method that was then taken, and which was followed up by the law-making power in 1882, we stood better and better with China. We had accomplished the first and practical act—that is, of liberation from our own negotiation and our own obligations as sought by us in the Burlingame treaty.

Is it any fault of China if we do not know how to pass searching and vigorous laws in execution of our rights as conceded to us by the treaty with China? Is it any fault of China that we, being a free and not a despotic nation, find difficulties in executing our rightful laws, and that our customs officers, either by negligence or by the principles I have stated, of freedom and adherence to law, find it an embarrassment to us to execute what has been conceded to us? Certainly we have no right towards China but to present to her these difficulties and ask for a further concession in maintenance of our diplomatic relations and our existing treaties and desires further in this direction.

The proposed treaty of 1888 is precisely of that nature, and until within the last few weeks no question was raised in this country but that that treaty with China gave us, if not all the power a despotic government would have, all the power that as between us and China it was righteous for us to ask or was just on the part of China towards us. To what does it relate? It relates to the dealings with the citizens and subjects who are already here under permissive treaties which have tolerated if not invited them. Do you suppose when China has been asked by our amendments to carry this exclusion by its consent to the very verge of our need or our desire, she does not, as a parental government, just to its subjects, feel a scruple of scrutiny and deliberation before it concedes what when once conceded is irrevocable as to the fate of its subjects who have departed from its shores to our country, our hospitality inviting and protecting them?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from New York except to ask him if he remembers the number of instances in which the Chinese Government has made reparation to our citizens for wrongs and injustice done to our people in China under the same treaties.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, uniformly reparation has been made, I believe.

Mr. MORGAN. In how many instances?

Mr. EVARTS. I can not say, but in every instance in which we needed it.

Mr. MORGAN. China has always made reparation to us?

Mr. EVARTS. I think so.

Mr. MORGAN. So that her people have violated treaties as well as our own?

Mr. EVARTS. We have not hesitated to return damages and reparation when we were obliged to do so. I do not mean obliged by China, but obliged by our own sense of duty.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to state, if it does not interrupt the Senator from New York, that in his absence his colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] informed the Senate that the Senator if present would vote for this bill, and thereupon my pair with the Senator from New York was considered as being at an end, and I of course was at liberty to vote. I owe him an apology, finding that he is opposed to the bill, for having voted.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not think that any apology is due to me from the Senator, nor is any apology due to me from my colleague. My colleague acted upon his judgment in the matter, and it was quite right that the Senator should act upon that concession. I had observed that up to a certain point my colleague had reserved the opinion concerning me, but at last when there was general consent all around, I suppose, of everybody, and no one opposing the bill, he considered that I might come in then in favor of the bill.

I have said that I am not certain that this can be properly treated as in our intent and purpose a denunciation of the treaty; but it is certainly a violation of it, and would not need any justification from China itself to denounce the treaty in consequence of its violation. If the bill does not attempt to abrogate, but only to violate and take the consequences, and if China does not retaliate by abrogating the whole fabric because of this encroachment and violation, then, on the face of the bill, we should be open to every reclamation against this Government for every one of the Chinamen who was put to a loss or injury to his stipulated rights under the existing treaty. It is a violation of their rights; it is a violation of the rights which are secured to them not only in general, but by our own legislation giving them the rights and the immunities of their rights; and then if the matter went no further, every one of these Chinese laborers who is placed under a ban and an exclusion, when without this bill he would have rights by law, will have a reclamation, and this Government will have no answer in the forum, I will not say of conscience, because rightful duty is our law, private and public, under an absolute obligation to make indemnity.

I do not raise this question as bearing upon the amount of burden upon the Treasury, which should be cheerfully borne, but it represents exactly what the nature of this transaction is; that it is a violation not only of our obligations to China, but it is a violation of the personal rights of these people as now enjoyed under our laws.

Is there any Senator here doubts if China should thus deal with our citizens there, enjoying the hospitality and protection of the treaty of 1858 and the treaty of 1880, what this Executive, what this Congress, what this people, would say, though it was the humblest attendant upon a missionary's establishment or a mere clerk in a mercantile firm there? What has the President thus lately encouraged the American people? That we do but half our duty in protecting our citizens here if we do not protect them also abroad. What is the casus, what is the situation of deliberation on the part of the Chinese Empire as to what it regards as a grave extension of its privilege in dealing with subjects of that empire still here? What is the delay? We had a treaty with a little power down in South America, with Venezuela. Although we made a remission of our treaty and made a new bargain, how long has she been without ratifying that concession of ours? Is it two years, or three years? The Senator from Alabama is better informed on this as on other affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. My information is—it is not official at all—that the convention has been ratified.

Mr. EVARTS. Just now. What was the delay?

Mr. MORGAN. There was quite a delay.

Mr. EVARTS. A couple of years.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the same thing will occur with any Oriental people or any Spanish people or any people who want to defer a question of this kind. I suppose we shall always have delays about such matters.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I have sufficiently indicated how I should have voted had I been in the Senate. I have one word more to say in regard to the situation, as I understand it, which would be produced by the passage of this bill, and then the ratification by the Chinese Empire of the pending treaty. If ratifications are exchanged between this Government and the Chinese Empire, which is dependent upon the Executive here so far as this nation is concerned, this act, if it shall pass, falls to the ground, for it is a settled proposition that a treaty and a law are of equal import and dominion domestically, and the latter one, therefore, whether law or treaty, is the paramount power.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask at this time a question. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and others have spoken of the enactment of this bill into a law as operating as a breach of public faith with China; and the whole debate seems to go upon the assumption that while this instrument which we have approved is in the possession of the Chinese Government, and unaccepted by that government, there is no power on our part of a revocation of our proposition. I should like to ask the Senator what rights we have in that regard, if they are pursued in the due and formal manner?

Mr. EVARTS. I have perhaps covered that point sufficiently by my reply to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be true. I was obliged to be out of the Chamber for a few moments.

Mr. EVARTS. Until ratifications are exchanged it is no treaty.

Mr. BLAIR. There is the power by giving notice of revocation.

Mr. EVARTS. There is power now to give notice, undoubtedly; and politeness requires it. Courtesy between nations requires that immediate notice, if this bill passes, should be given that this Government does not propose to go on with the treaty.

Mr. BLAIR. The national honor requires that.

Mr. EVARTS. The national honor is violated in respect to the treaty already in force, as I have stated.

Mr. BLAIR. I was speaking only of the pending treaty.

Mr. EVARTS. We have violated our obligation in respect of this inchoate treaty, in that without any public event between China and us whatever we have departed from negotiations and have undertaken to pass laws which are at variance with the existing treaty. It is not only an obligation to behave as a man of honor, but it is an obligation to behave in a manner that justifies castigation if we do not perform it.

Mr. BLAIR. If that be the principle, I do not see why it is not a destruction of the right of revocation of our proposition. If a proposition can not be recalled in a due and formal manner without a justification of war, it seems to me there can be no such right.

Mr. EVARTS. I was speaking in regard to the existing treaty.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator whether we have not the right by a law to abrogate the existing treaty without any violation of the national honor?

Mr. EVARTS. No; we have the power.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose that the power resides in the Congress.

Mr. EVARTS. We have the power.

Mr. BLAIR. It strikes me that we can not have power to do a thing which is wrong.

Mr. EVARTS. We often do.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know; but we have perhaps the power derived from the devil to do it. However, the powers of this Government to which I refer are supposed to be derived from a higher source. The powers vested in the Constitution, the powers which we have by virtue of international law, the great principles of right and justice are the powers I had reference to.

Mr. EVARTS. We have the power by the Constitution to do things that are wrong, morally wrong, politically wrong, and in the interest of society wrong. The best evidence of that is that we frequently repeal them because we find that out. But the power and the right are two different matters.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to ask the Senator whether, if the people of this country should become convinced that a continuance of the treaty was working great and permanent injury to the country, it would be not only our right but our duty to abrogate it?

Mr. EVARTS. To that I agree: and we take the consequences.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. That is the proposition. Then there is no wrong in doing that.

Mr. EVARTS. There is no moral wrong in doing that, but it is a violation of your obligation, which you have faced under a sterner necessity.

The only instance of the denunciation of a treaty is that of the French treaty, which we denounced; but see with what preface we accompanied that action:

> The action of Congress in the matter of the French treaties, in 1798, if it be regarded as an abrogation by this nation of a subsisting treaty, strongly illustrates the character and degree of justification which was then thought suitable to such a proceeding. The preamble of the act recites that "the treaties concluded between the United States and France have been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed have been refused, and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations have been repelled with indignity."

That was our situation, which we thought gave the right to abrogate a treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question? I ask him whether the declaration made in the treaty which has recently been ratified, as we say, by the Senate, of the purpose of the Chinese Government, is not a moral absolution of this country from the previous engagements by which we permitted their people to come here? I will read it:

> Whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much-deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States.

Does the Senator attach no importance to that declaration?

Mr. EVARTS. I attach all the importance to it that its import carries. It is a reason, and a proper reason, given by it for yielding in what is there given on its part towards us. It is not, however, a concession that we are to exercise it at our option and not by her consent. What she is ready to permit is shown by the clause which follows and the clauses which protect the subjects who are still here.

I do not say it often happens, but it may happen that a nation violates a treaty without abrogating or intending to abrogate it. In our commercial treaties, for instance, we have certain arrangements—conspicuously we had with Russia—as to the rates at which we would exact duty. We exacted by our tariff certain rates that covered the Russian hemp of importation, not in that name and not in that intent touching Russia, but covering all hemp. Russia complained, and we refunded out of our Treasury to the Russian Government all the excessive duties that we had collected. So, although it was really a violation, pro tanto, of the treaty, although our domestic legislation had displaced, replaced, repealed, if you please, pro tanto, the treaty, so that our port and domestic regulations were governed by the tariff, yet it left us not justified towards Russia by our having abrogated the rate of duty arranged. We accordingly conceded the fact, and we repaid what was exacted.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a case in which the Government of the United States deliberately violated a treaty by an act of Congress, and refused any sort of redress to the parties who were ruined by it? It is the case reported in 11 Wallace, with which he is familiar, the Cherokee tobacco case. In 1866 we made a solemn treaty with the Cherokee Nation, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided in the decision in 11 Wallace that that treaty was of the same binding force upon this Government as a treaty with England or France. We stipulated in that treaty that the internal revenue laws, the tax laws, of the United States should not apply to the Indian Territory. Afterwards we deliberately passed an act of Congress applying the internal-revenue laws to the Territory. Our officers went into the Territory, seized the tobacco factory of Boudinot & Stand Wattie, confiscated all their tobacco, together with their warehouses and factories. The Supreme Court decided that we had a perfect right to do it, and those men have never been paid one dollar in the way of damages from that day to this.

Mr. EVARTS. There was no nation behind them.

Mr. VEST. The Supreme Court decided that the Congress of the United States had both the right and the power to collect the tax.

Mr. EVARTS. The Indians had no power behind them like Russia.

Mr. VEST. That made it so much the worse.

Mr. EVARTS. It made it the worse in our moral conduct, and illustrates to my friend from New Hampshire that a nation may do wrong and yet have power to do wrong.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not controvert the Senator's proposition. My suggestion was as to the source from which the power was derived.

Mr. EVARTS. I am talking somewhat at large, but not more widely than is necessary to present the status that we are now in for our action and the action here proposed. It is perhaps debatable whether this proposed legislation is an abrogation of the treaty or only a violation of it to be accounted for in damages, or it may be an abrogation which thus removes the fabric of all our treaties, or it may be an abrogation which will not carry down all the treaties unless the justifiable conduct of China shall itself carry them down by denunciation.

All I ask is that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I should like to have that deliberation, that inspection beforehand that will need to enforce itself upon this Government, and upon this Senate, and upon this people hereafter for all the people of the United States who agree with Senators on the other side and Senators on this side, and agree with me, that Chinese immigration must be absolutely exterminated so far and so fast as can be done according to the principles of law and duty. I am not of the opinion that we should assume an attitude toward this great and friendly nation of China that is inconsistent with true relations of good neighborhood and of public peace.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me for one moment. He was proceeding to state what his opinion was as to the effect of this measure if it should become a law and if it should be ascertained that there was a subsisting treaty between this Government and the Chinese Empire. The Senator was interrupted just at the point where he was giving his opinion on that subject. I should be very glad if he would continue to express his view upon that point.

Mr. EVARTS. I supposed that I had completed my statement, having shown that it depends upon the President whether ratifications shall be exchanged, and when ratifications are exchanged and it becomes a treaty, this act, earlier in date, is superseded by the later treaty.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, when this bill was put upon its passage last Friday, 3 votes were cast against it. I cast one of them. It seemed to me then, as it seems to me now, that among the various reasons justifying that vote, there was one which was sufficient.

All persons acquainted with the political and diplomatic history of this country are aware of the long contention we had with other nations in respect of the doctrine of the right of expatriation. We could find no power on the face of the globe to agree with the position we had assumed on that subject. We had put the doctrine in our Constitution; we had insisted upon it in our diplomacy; we had knocked at the doors of the nations of the earth and asked that they would give recognition to it. But one after the other answered us, "No; we can not agree to that; once a subject, always a subject; a man born in England the Crown of England can not recognize as a citizen of the United States." So, like answers came from all of the nations to whom we made advances in that respect. Along through the weary years of this nation's progress we kept up an insistence in our correspondence with other nations that there should be some recognition given to that principle.

Never, until we reached the year 1868, did we meet with a power that would agree with us. On the 27th day of July, 1868, a law went into effect, having been passed by the two Houses of Congress and approved by the President, asserting our position concerning the doctrine of the right of expatriation. The declaration was pointed, brief, and effective. It may be found in section 1999 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows:

> Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore, any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officer of the United States which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Republic.

That declaration passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 107 yeas to 4 nays; it passed the Senate of the United States by a vote of 39 yeas to 5 nays; so that by almost a unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress we have a definite declaration of the doctrine of this Republic in respect of the right of expatriation.

After that was done, what happened next? This act took effect by approval on the 27th day of July, 1868. On the 28th day of July, the next day, the Burlingame treaty between the United States and China was signed. What language was carried into that treaty? The next day after that definite and resolute declaration by the Congress of the United States had become a law by the approval of the President, there was put in that treaty this language:

> The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

And there was put into the sixth article the following:

> Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

Mr. President, could we have induced any other nation on the face of the globe, after our long search for the one to agree with us, to have given that formal and emphatic recognition of our position concerning the right of expatriation? Was it an important subject to us? We had, as I have already remarked, introduced the right of expatriation and of naturalization into our Constitution. We had carried it into our laws; we had naturalized the subjects of other powers, and because of that had been involved in difficulties with other nations. But we went on in the line of asserting that doctrine until in the year 1868 the Emperor of China conceded it, and made the first treaty with us affirming it as a true doctrine.

Mr. President, I recognize fully the right of a nation as well as I do of an individual to exercise the right of self-protection and self-preservation; so that the nation avowing the doctrine which I have read may protect itself against involvement in its internal affairs through the introduction of improper, unsafe, vicious, or criminal additions to its inhabitants. It has the whole scope of self-preservation; and if we should require the passage of a measure as severe in terms as the one now pending it may be exercised, just as the individual in protecting himself may go to the extremity of taking the life of his assailant.

Shall we, in view of this conduct of China, select that power as the one against which we will first exercise the authority that is involved in the bill now pending of declaring void a treaty yet in process of construction, although we have done all we can towards making it perfect and it remains with China to do its part therein?

Shall we select, I say, this power to legislate against in this haste—I will not say indecent haste, for that we would not do—but in this haste, this want of circumspect action, this absence of deliberate judgment? Shall we select this case in which to so act; or shall we take that decent course which will secure to us a reasonable time for consideration, reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and let it go to a proper committee for consideration? If in the mean time the information arrives that China has rejected the treaty, then with more propriety we may legislate again, at the same time assuring ourselves sufficient postponement to know whether China will or will not agree with us in this modification of the treaty as she has in all others which have been submitted.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, in view of what I have suggested in connection with the course of that power towards us, that we ought to have a reasonable delay which will enable us to pursue the proper, conservative, well-considered course, and save us from the charge of being ungrateful towards the first power that agreed with us on that point.

Mr. STEWART. It is almost too late now, and the Senate is almost too thin for me to discuss this question, because I want the Senate to hear facts before it makes another mistake.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Will my colleague yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. STEWART. In just one moment, and then I should like to adjourn.

I want the Senate to hear the facts, I say, and the situation, and take their bearings before they commit a mistake as great as President Hayes did in the veto referred to by the Senator from New York. I want a little time, when the Senate is full, to call their attention to the terrible calamity which has happened while we are talking about etiquette, the ruin that is taking place in San Francisco and on the Pacific coast, the diseases which are being spread while we are talking about etiquette. I want to show that the Government of the United States must take this thing in hand and spend no more time in negotiating with the Six Companies or we shall never see any end to the trouble. I want a little time for that purpose, and I should like to have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Nevada to yield to his colleague.

Mr. STEWART. I yield for a motion to adjourn.

R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee on the several amendments:

On amendments numbered 11 and 12: Appropriates $700,000 for the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for the Army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. On amendments numbered 16, 17, and 18: Makes verbal corrections in the text of the bill.

On amendments numbered 19, 20, and 21: Appropriates $250,000 for purchase of material for and the manufacture of 12-inch breech-loading rifle mortars of cast-iron hooped with steel, said mortars to be subject to inspection in all stages of manufacture.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
WM. H. FORNEY,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I move the adoption of the report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGISTERED-MAIL LOCKS, ETC.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to make a privileged report. I report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 11391) to authorize the Postmaster-General to advertise for and purchase improved registered-mail locks and keys therefor was read a first and second time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the consideration of this bill at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, under the order of the House, has the right to make this report at any time, and that carries with it the privilege of consideration; but the bill, unless unanimous consent is given for its consideration in the House, must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to advertise for and receive proposals for such registered-mail locks and keys for such locks for the use of the Post-Office Department as he may deem suitable for the safety and security of registered mail matter; and he is further authorized to make contracts for such locks and keys for the supply of the Post-Office Department, if he deem the same suitable, and for such a number of years, not to exceed four, as he may deem best for the interest of the mail service, with power, however, to the Postmaster-General to renew such contract or contracts, should he make any contracts under the provisions of this act, for said articles of mail equipment, for another and additional period of four years, should he deem it proper and advisable so to do. And the sum of $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purchase of such locks and keys therefor, if such contract or contracts be made: Provided, however, That no part of said appropriation shall be expended unless new registering locks and keys therefor are adopted by the Postmaster-General for the use of the mail service under the authority given by this act.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, quite recently it has been discovered that the locks for the registered-mail matter are defective, seriously exposing to loss that class of mail matter. The Postmaster-General, in view of this fact, has thought it may probably be necessary to change all the locks now used. The appropriation in this bill is designed to meet that emergency. It authorizes a contract to be made for four years, with a power of renewal on the part of the Postmaster-General at the expiration of that time for an additional term of four years. Under the existing law general supplies for the Post-Offise Department can not be contracted for beyond the term of a single year. An exception, however, to this provision of law is made with respect to mail locks and keys and mail-bags, in reference to which contracts may be made for four years. Under that general provision contracts for mail locks and keys have been entered into for a period of four years, and in the contract there is a provision reserving to the Government, through the Postmaster-General, the power to compel a supply of such locks and keys for a second and a third term of four years each, making a period of twelve years.

The criticism has been made that under the provisions of existing law such conditions can not properly be inserted in the contract, and a provision in this bill has been framed to meet that difficulty. This provision in the contract is important to the Government, because with that in force these locks can not be supplied to anybody else for eight years if the Post-Office Department may desire to retain control over them for that period. So carefully has the Department seen fit to insist upon the terms of the present contract that the contractor is not allowed to make a contract with the Treasury Department for supplying these locks, it being deemed proper that the Post-Office Department should have absolute control over this system of locks and keys.

If it should appear upon more thorough examination that the defects in the existing locks may be supplied much more easily than is apprehended, then, under this bill, the Postmaster-General will not be allowed to expend this money for any other purpose than the bill contemplates.

I have now explained the whole matter, and unless some gentleman desires to make some inquiry I will ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

PUBLICATION OF "WITHHELD" REMARKS.

Mr. SCOTT. I rise to a correction of the RECORD. On Friday last the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] brought against me in this House certain charges to which I replied. The official stenographer of this House made out a report of those proceedings. The remarks which I made were handed to me at 7 o'clock in the evening; and by 8 o'clock they were sent to the Public Printer. Thinking it possible, however, that my remarks might get in as an answer to my colleague's, while his might not appear at the same time, I took the precaution to send word to the Public Printer that I did not wish what I had said to be put in the RECORD until my colleague inserted his remarks. He received the copy of his remarks from the stenographer, and, as I am informed, put them in his pocket, and has gone off to Pennsylvania. Whether he proposes to return again or not, I do not know. But I think, as the Official Stenographer has every word that was uttered by Mr. BRUMM, and as, under objections made, he was not allowed to print anything which he did not say or which he had not read, it is nothing more than justice to myself that the proceedings in that debate should now go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as they took place in this House. I therefore ask, sir, if it be in order, that this matter be put into the RECORD, so that Mr. BRUMM'S charges and my answers thereto shall go in together. I make the motion, therefore, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is a matter over which the Chair has no control whatever. The law provides for the reporting and publishing of the official debates and proceedings of the House. The practice has heretofore always been, so far as the present occupant of the chair is aware, for gentlemen, when they desire, to withhold their remarks for revision; and as to the length of time that they may withhold them the Chair knows of no rule or restriction.

The Chair supposes, however, that the matter is always under the control of the House; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a motion——

Mr. SCOTT. I do not wish to do injustice to anybody. But I think it is proper that these charges and the answer should be published together, and I move, therefore, that the Official Stenographers be directed to put the remarks into the official record exactly as they occurred on this floor, and that this be done at once.

Mr. MORGAN. Unless they are furnished by Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. CANNON. Without waiving the question of order which may be raised at this time, I desire simply to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as his colleague is absent he had better wait until his return, or else notify him to return.

It is common, and always has been, for gentlemen, when they desire to do so, to withhold their remarks, some of them a week, some two, some a month; and I have known instances where, without, perhaps, any great loss to the RECORD or to the country, they never were inserted. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman himself is not overvigilant. It is a maxim of equity that he who seeks equity must do equity. The gentleman is himself subject to some criticism. His three or four hours' speech has not yet appeared in the RECORD. So I think it is perhaps better at least to wait until the return of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, especially as the gentleman should recollect that there was a request made to print, and in one of the few instances in this Congress it was denied.

I think very likely the House will get into a good humor after a while, and both the gentlemen will have their remarks appear in the RECORD, and it may be in such form as to do all parties justice.

Mr. SCOTT. That is just what I desire.

Mr. CANNON. It strikes me, therefore, that we had better not be in a hurry. The gentleman himself says that he revised his remarks, and I understand that Mr. BRUMM, who had his remarks for revision, was called away unexpectedly.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I give notice that I will call this matter up within a week's time, and will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. FORNEY. Regular order.

ROOMS FOR SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 21, 1888.

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims and the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census be authorized and empowered to retain the use of the committee-room now occupied by them in the Butler Building during the recess and during the second session of this Congress at the same rent as is now paid; and that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be also authorized to occupy a room in the said building at the rate of $50 per month during the balance of this session and during the recess and the second session of this Congress; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay all of said rent out of the contingent fund of the House.

ROOMS FOR COMMITTEES DURING THE RECESS, BALANCE OF THIS SESSION, AND SECOND SESSION OF THE FIFTIETH CONGRESS.

Mr. BOOTHMAN, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report:

Your committee having had under consideration the resolution introduced by Mr. Cox, July 21, 1888, and referred to the Committee on Accounts, providing in substance for the rental of rooms in the Butler Building, so called, for the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department during the recess, balance of this session, and the second session of this Congress, report as follows: The two rooms in said building now occupied by the two select committees first above named have heretofore at this session been rented for said committees by and in accordance with a resolution of the House, and are necessary for that purpose during the sessions of this Congress, and from the work necessary to be done by the Committee on the Eleventh Census during the recess, and the importance of having a proper place for the storage and keeping of the papers and documents of the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims and the performance of its work during the same time, we further find that the use of said two rooms is also necessary during the recess of this Congress. We therefore unite in recommending that the resolution as to the rental of said two rooms for said select committees be passed.

Regarding the rental of a room in the same building for the rest of this session, during the recess, and for the second session of this Congress for the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, your committee find the following to be the facts: Said committee has already assigned to its use a certain room on the basement floor of the Capitol Building. Said room is small, illy-ventilated, and illy-lighted, it being necessary to use gas-light therein whenever and at whatever time it may be used by the said committee. Upon general principles, it would seem that a committee, as a body, ought not to be required to occupy a room which none of its members would occupy from choice, or as individuals. We also find that said committee has held several meetings during this session (being seven or eight in number) in the Judiciary Committee room, by the sufferance of the Committee on the Judiciary, and has not met in the room assigned to it for the reasons above named. While your committee feel that proper and suitable rooms for meeting ought to be provided and assigned to each committee of the House, yet the fact being that one room has already been assigned to this committee, we do not feel like changing the present arrangement, although we are not at all satisfied that the room assigned is a comfortable and suitable room. We therefore report back that portion of said resolution without recommendation.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. In explanation of the report I will say simply this: The Committees on the Eleventh Census and on Indian Depredation Claims have had assigned to them by a former resolution of the House rooms in the Butler Building. It is proposed by this report to enable them to occupy the rooms in question during the coming recess, if it occurs——

Mr. CONGER. "If it occurs!"

Mr. BOOTHMAN. And also during the second session of this Congress. There is no question but that it will be necessary for the second session, and for a short time between the two sessions, if there is to be any vacation, it is also necessary. We report, therefore, in favor of that part of the resolution.

As to the second portion of the resolution, conceiving it to be divisible, we simply say that the room assigned to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is of the character described in the report, utterly unfit for the business to be transacted by the committee, for which reason it has not heretofore been used by the committee. But the room having been assigned to it, we did not feel it proper to interfere.

Mr. BLAND. Let me ask if it would not be possible for the two committees to occupy one room?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. In answer to the inquiry, it seems to me that it would hardly do to mix up the Census Committee with the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims.

Mr. BLAND. How much mixing would there be? How many meetings have they had?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I am not advised as to the meetings, but unquestionably if there is to be a census the committee must have the opportunity of preparing the way for it.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims meets once a week; and that the Committee on the Census has probably met once during the session. In view of that, if it be true, it seems that one room ought to be sufficient for both.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Whatever may have been the action of the committee heretofore, the necessity for the work to be done by the committee is admitted by all. As to how the committee may do its duty may be a matter of criticism perhaps, but it does not enter into the consideration of the Committee on Accounts.

If there is no further question, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend by making one room for both of these committees. There are a number of instances in which more than one committee uses one room.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the resolution as reported provides for three committees using one room—the Committee on Indian Depredations, the Committee on the Eleventh Census, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. COWLES. Right there, in connection with the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, I desire to ask a question——

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question, and that cuts off any amendment to the resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I understand it leaves the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department where it is now.

The SPEAKER. The committee only reports the resolution back.

Mr. BLAND. Then, I move to amend the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has demanded the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. It does seem to me that it should be amended.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I think the gentleman had better allow an amendment on that resolution.

The question was put, and the Speaker was in doubt as to the result.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 35.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum. We had better have a count by tellers.

The SPEAKER appointed the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] as tellers.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported 38 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the demand for the previous question, and the gentleman from Missouri moves to amend the resolution by striking out all that part which relates to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent that the objection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is directed to that part of the resolution which proposes to provide a room for the Committee on Expenditures of the Treasury Department. My relation to that committee justifies me in asking the House to remove this objection by striking out that portion of the resolution. It is true that the room which was assigned to that committee when the session commenced is unfit for committee meetings or committee work of any kind whatever, so entirely unfit that it has not been used by the committee at a single meeting.

Notwithstanding this and notwithstanding the fact that the committee has had an unusual amount of business, including a very important and tedious investigation, I did not request that this committee be included in the resolution, preferring to pay for the rent of the committee-room myself than to ask for an outlay that the most scrupulous economist could intimate might be avoided. I desire, however, to say that I appreciate the courtesy and consideration of the distinguished gentleman who prepared the resolution now before the House, and I also equally appreciate the spirit manifested by the members of the Committee on Accounts, all of whom it appears were impressed with its propriety, and I thank them all for their efforts in behalf of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member.

While the room in the center and lower part of the Capitol which was originally assigned to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is not adapted to such use, its location makes it quite valuable to the Doorkeeper with his unusually crowded work, and if this is known it very probably had its influence upon some gentlemen who regard the measure as advisable, but in order that the provision for the Committees on the Census and Indian Depredations may not be retarded—for I regard the portion of the resolution which refers to and provides for them as absolutely essential—I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the resolution be stricken out, and as thus amended that the resolution be adopted.

If this is done I will gladly continue to care for the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment, and there were—ayes 32, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the resolution as amended.

The question was put, and the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 20.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I make the point of no quorum.

The Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

After some time spent in the count,

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to withdraw the resolution and report?

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution and report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference.

SIGNAL STATION ON WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

Mr. WHEELER introduced a bill (H. R. 11392) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to establish signal stations on the West India Islands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. 11393) to amend the naturalization laws of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LIBRARY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HOLMAN offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the Select Committee of Investigation of the Construction of the new Library Building be printed.

PAVING ALLEY IN DES MOINES, IOWA.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (H. R. 11394) providing payment for paving the alley adjoining the United States Government building in Des Moines, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

OVERHEAD ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina (by request), introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 220) limiting the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia," etc., on the subject of overhead electric wires, approved July 18, 1888; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

TRUSTS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. 11395) to check and nullify the baleful operations of pernicious combinations commonly called trusts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGES OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11396) depriving a judge of a United States court of the authority to give an opinion on questions of fact; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. 11397) for the relief of certain gaugers and other internal-revenue employés who have been assigned to duty and have rendered services before the date of their qualification.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I ask that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The Chair thinks this bill under the rules would go to the Committee on Claims, but the Chair will submit the request of the gentleman to the House, and if there be no objection, it will be referred as requested.

There was no objection.

INLAND WATER WAY FROM NEW YORK TO FLORIDA.

Mr. MCCLAMMY introduced a bill (H. R. 11398) to provide an inland water way from New York to Florida; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

COMPENSATION OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS FOR EXTRA SERVICES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. 11399) to regulate the compensation of officers of customs for extra services rendered at night, on holidays, and out of business hours; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

DIRECT TAX OF 1862.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio (by Mr. FORAN), introduced (by request) a bill (H. R. 11400) to carry into effect the provisions of the twelfth section of the act of June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts of the United States, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PREVENTION OF "TRUSTS."

Mr. CULBERSON introduced a bill (H. R. 11401) for the prevention of "trusts;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that this bill be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read.

Mr. DUNN. I ask that the committee have leave to report this bill at any time.

Mr. BACON objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

Mr. BLAND. It seems to me that this bill, instead of going to the Committee on the Judiciary, should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, inasmuch as it refers to duties on imports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that the bill properly goes to the Committee on the Judiciary, because it proposes to define new offenses.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to the reference proposed.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not desire to object to the privilege of reporting at any time; but I would suggest whether the bill should not properly go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the gentleman that three-fourths of the provisions of this bill are strictly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary. There is one provision, standing alone, which might properly be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. Therefore, as will be perceived, the bill might properly go to either committee; but I insist that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The one-fourth of the bill which the gentleman concedes belongs properly to the Committee on Ways and Means would appear to be the most important part of the bill; but as the gentleman who introduces the bill is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not object to the reference to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this is one of those peculiar cases where either of two committees would probably have jurisdiction of the measure.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the committee have leave to report at any time?

Mr. KELLEY. I object to that.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FREE IMPORTATION OF COTTON-BAGGING, ETC.

Mr. CRAIN introduced a bill (H. R. 11402) to exempt from duty the importation of bagging for cotton, or other manufactures suitable for the uses to which cotton-bagging is applied; which was read a first and second time.

The bill having been, upon the request of Mr. CRAIN, read in full, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO POSTAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BLOUNT introduced a bill (H. R. 11403) to provide for granting leaves of absence to employés of the Post-Office Department employed in the mail-bag-repair shops in said Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT QUINCY, ILL.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. 11404) to establish a port of delivery at Quincy, in the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have a correction made. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH] was appointed one of the conferees on the Army appropriation bill in place of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who went home; but it seems a message was sent to the Senate announcing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been appointed in place of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]. If there be no objection, the Chair will cause the Clerk to send to the Senate the necessary correction.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the second Monday of the month, the remainder of the day, if claimed by that committee, is set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Chair has been advised, however, by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], the chairman of that committee, that the committee has no business to present to-day.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I call up for consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read amendment numbered 119, as follows:

Insert the following:

"For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $250,000. And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law.

The following amendment to the Senate amendment was offered when the bill was last under consideration, by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky:

After the word "dollars," in line 1, on page 66, strike out the following:

"And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law."

And insert in lieu thereof:

"And the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation; and all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes, and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law."

The following amendment, offered by Mr. FELTON as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was also pending:

In line 9, page 1, after the word "——," insert "and for the selection of water-sheds that shall be preserved."

Line 5, after the word "purposes," insert "and such selected water-sheds."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] is entitled to the floor for twenty-two minutes.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to pursue this debate at the present time. I will only have read a dispatch which I have received from the officers of the interstate deep-harbor convention, held one week ago at Denver, Colo. After the reading of this dispatch I may say a word in explanation of the purpose of that convention.

The Clerk read as follows:

DENVER, COLO., September 1, 1883.

Senators TELLER, BOWEN, and Representative SYMES, Washington:

The interstate deep-harbor convention took up and unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to pass the amendment to House resolution No. 10540, offered by Senator BOWEN, of Colorado, and now pending before it, to provide for a line of surveys preliminary to the establishment of a system of reservoirs for the storage of water on the arid lands of the West, and that such reservoirs when established should be owned or controlled by the State governments for the irrigation of said lands by the owners thereof."

F. L. DANA, Secretary.

Mr. SYMES. I had that dispatch read for the purpose of informing the House that what is known as the deep-harbor convention, sitting at Denver, Colo., adopted, about one week ago, before the commencement of the debate on this amendment, the resolution which is embodied in that dispatch. I call attention to the fact that the deep-harbor convention had accredited to it, upon the report of the committee on credentials, 325 delegates from the great empire State of Texas; and that there were also represented in that convention by delegates the States of Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Iowa, and Colorado, and the Territories of Wyoming, Arizona, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory. The object of that convention, Mr. Speaker, was to devise ways and means for securing the construction of a deep-water harbor at Galveston, Aransas Pass, or some other practicable point upon the Texas coast of the Gulf of Mexico.

The occasion of this arose by reason of the completion of what is known as the Denver, Texas and Fort Worth Railroad, connecting the city of Denver, by way of Pueblo and Trinidad, in Southern Colorado, through Eastern New Mexico, and through the great State of Texas, directly with Galveston and the Gulf harbors. Mr. Speaker, the opening of that road during the past three months marks a new era in an important line of transportation to the seaboard for that great Southwestern country. It brings that great country (the prosperity of a good portion of which depends in the future upon the adoption of this Senate amendment) 500 miles nearer to the ocean than by way of Chicago, St. Louis, or other Eastern grand trunk routes.

This great convention having for its object the cheapening of transportation to the seaboard, by the lessening of the distance 500 miles, the representatives in the convention embracing, as I have said, 325 delegates from the great State of Texas, resolved unanimously in favor of this Senate amendment proposing to provide at once for the survey and reservation of these reservoir sites, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. I therefore appeal to the Representatives from Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, Iowa, and other States to support this amendment, because in doing so they will simply obey the behests of the solemn resolve of this important convention composed of so many of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the residue of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who it was understood, I believe, desired to proceed this morning, will give way for the present I will yield a few minutes of the time at my disposal to the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER].

Mr. HERBERT. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SYMES. I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] in charge of this measure, that I think we ought to have about one hour more for this discussion, in addition to the time reserved by those gentlemen who have already occupied the floor.

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, the time allotted me is very short in which to cover so important a question as the one now before us. But I desire to say to this House, in my judgment no more meritorious proposition has been submitted to our consideration during this session than this amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill providing for the reclamation of the vast area of arid land which lies west of the hundredth meridian, constituting in territorial area about one-third of the surface of the United States excluding Alaska. Within the limits of this territory there are three sovereign States, seven organized Territories, and portions of other States and Territories.

There is an insufficient rainfall on this vast region of country, and unless water is provided, it is doomed to perpetual aridness. The beneficent proposition made in this bill is to employ a portion of the public funds in the Treasury, under skillful management, to discover whether or not the waste water of the neighboring mountain tops overlooking these plains may not be so husbanded as to become useful for the purpose of irrigation. We know from previous experiments had in this desert region, that it requires only the introduction of water to make it blossom as the rose. Traversing this vast area are mountain ranges that pierce the clouds, upon the summits of which the snows of winter concentrate; the summer suns melt these snows and drain them into the valleys below. The banks of the streams are fertilized, but the chief body of the lands remain desert.

I feel a particular interest in this question more on account of the district I represent. Within my district, lying far beyond the Rocky Mountains and upon the Pacific Slope, there is a desert extending from the northern boundary of Mexico in a northerly direction for some 300 miles, and from 50 to 100 in width. These Sierras, under which this desert land lies, collect the snows of winter, which, melting under the summer sun, descend into the valleys below and are lost in the sand. It is a matter of vital importance not only to California, but to the whole country to reclaim this vast region of desert land, and to determine whether or not this waste water may not be applied to the purposes of reclamation and irrigation.

This region now called a desert, as has been proved by actual experiment, can be reclaimed and made fertile as any other part of California. The best part of California has been reclaimed by irrigation. Add to the public domain by reclamation this vast area of arid lands lying under the Sierra Mountains constituting this Mohave desert, you will bestow an incalculable, inestimable boon upon the entire country.

It is not within individual means and enterprise to utilize and save this waste water for purposes of irrigation. In all the past history of the world, countries where irrigation is necessary for the cultivation of the soil, the State has employed its energies to accomplish the enterprise, and has conducted water to fertilize its arid plains. If the Congress of the United States can appropriate money to remove impediments from the navigation of streams whose sources are in the mountains, why is it not also legitimate to appropriate money to preserve these sources and there collect and economize the waste water? Why is it not proper to furnish great reservoirs from which water can be obtained to irrigate and fertilize the thirsty plains below, thus adding to the general wealth of the country incalculable millions by increase of the public domain for settlement?

This small appropriation of $250,000 is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the immense benefits which are to flow from so judicious an appropriation. Therefore I say, no proposition made in this House during this session of Congress is, in my estimation, more deserving approval of this body than the one now pending, to utilize the waste water accumulating in the mountains and apply it to the fertilization of the plains below.

There we are in that country situated on the plain, looking up towards the summit of the towering mountains, covered with the snows of winter through all seasons of the year, snows which have fallen and drifted in the valleys a hundred feet in depth, and in timber lands and on the levels, where it does not drift, 15 or 20 feet in depth; and from this immense accumulation arises the streams which feed these various rivers whose waters it is proposed shall be utilized. In that portion of the country represented by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] is found that great range of mountains from which descends the Arkansas and the Red Rivers to the plain, flowing into the Mississippi River and thence to the seaboard; and on the other side comes the Colorado, flowing westward and seeking an outlet to the sea on the Pacific side; and so important has this subject become that the people of the State of Colorado and the adjacent States have recently met in a convention at Denver and presented the subject to the Congress of the United States for its attention, asking favorable consideration of this measure. For, Mr. Speaker, this is a question that appeals to the people of the surrounding States as well as to Colorado, and if it appeals to them, it appeals with as great or even greater force to the people of the whole Pacific coast.

We have this range of mountains running from Alaska clear through to the Gulf of California, in which are stored these exhaustless supplies of water; and if by proper expenditure of money and availing ourselves of that skill which science enables us to employ we can ascertain the convenient points to retain this water and store it in reservoirs, to be released at the proper time under a system to be adopted by the Government, it will be a benefit of incalculable value not only to the people of the present generation but to the generations that are to come which will occupy that region. For these reasons, therefore, I urge upon this House at the present time that the Senate amendment be adopted, and that the House recede from its disagreement to that amendment, for there is no more beneficial proposition contained in any of the appropriation bills that have been submitted for our action during the present session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the House proposes an appropriation of $250,000 to continue the survey in the arid regions. Upon its face the amendment seems to be a very simple and innocent proposition; but I wish to tell the House that it means millions upon millions of dollars' expenditure from the public Treasury if the amendment shall be adopted. The $250,000 is a mere bagatelle. It is the entering wedge which will take up the surplus in the Treasury and millions of dollars besides.

Major Powell, the Director of the Geological Survey, says that the arid regions embrace two-fifths of this country, or 1,300,000 square miles of territory, a large proportion of which can be irrigated, a small percentage by the use of the small streams, and about 15 per cent. can be irrigated by the storage of water in reservoirs by employing the larger streams for that purpose. He says in that way 96,000,000 acres can be irrigated. Now, the question comes up, before embarking on such an enterprise, what will it cost? This $250,000 is appropriated for the survey, but it does not complete it. It needs an appropriation of five millions more to complete it. Major Powell says that he can only use $250,000 this year, but the next year and for five succeeding years he will need $1,000,000, making a total of five and a quarter millions simply to do the work of survey.

After the completion of the survey, what have we? A report from Major Powell showing what land can be irrigated and where the sites for reservoirs exist, where they shall be established, where canals shall be dug, and we have no lands irrigated, no reservoirs built, no canals dug, although we have appropriated and paid five and a quarter millions of dollars. Who then is to do this work? It must be done either by the aggregation of capital—by corporations—or the Government. How much will it cost if done by the Government? Major Powell says he does not know, and it does not belong to his bureau to ascertain; that it is a matter for the engineers. But the sum will be enormous. It is to be done by capitalists or the Government, I repeat. If done by capitalists, they must get their money out of the people by charging so much for every acre of land that is irrigated through their canals. No one knows what it will cost. No one has attempted to ascertain. Major Powell himself says that in the aggregate the sum will be enormous. How much? I venture to guess, and I think I am not far from correct, that the 96,000,000 acres he says can be irrigated by the storage of water, in the mountains, will cost $10 an acre, or $960,000,000.

Mr. FELTON. The gentleman does not mean for the survey?

Mr. FORNEY. Oh, no; that costs five and a quarter millions, as I have said.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, to ask him a question: If the location of the reservoirs is assumed to be followed by the construction of the canals by the Government of the United States?

Mr. FORNEY. Of course. It can not be done any other way. It must be done either by the Government or else by capitalists.

It is simply impossible for the Government to undertake this work. The Government will have to pay out $960,000,000 to accomplish it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know if this proposition which the gentleman has been developing has been reported upon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Secretary of the Interior, or any person connected with the Executive Departments; and if any recommendations have been submitted in regard to it, or any report?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no report.

Mr. SYMES. I can answer, if the gentleman is not familiar with the facts.

Mr. FORNEY. I have the facts here. The Senate called upon the Secretary of the Interior, as shown by Executive Document 163.

Mr. BLOUNT. What date?

Mr. FORNEY. May 11, 1888; and Mr. Vilas referred this matter to the Director of the Geological Survey, Major Powell. He reported upon it. But Mr. Vilas makes no recommendation whatever. Mr. Powell does. He says that the report should be adopted, and he submits an amendment or suggests an amendment recommending that this be done. I say that if that amendment should be adopted it is the entering wedge for the expenditure of millions and millions on the headwaters in the mountains.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion there?

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not true that there is not a place on the American continent to-day where irrigation has been successfully and extensively inaugurated and carried on that it has not cost even a higher figure than $10 an acre?

Mr. FORNEY. No doubt. There has been some done at less, and probably more at not less than $10 an acre. The rental of the water, if this is done by corporation, would be from $1.50 to $4 an acre per annum.

Mr. SYMES. If the gentleman will yield to me I will answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, and say that thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres of the best agricultural lands in this country to-day are made arable by irrigation, by ditches, where it has cost only from $1 to $2.50 an acre.

Mr. FORNEY. That is where branches and springs can be used; but the proposition here is to make reservoirs in the mountains. It is outside of the land where the irrigation can be done by ditching, and the land that would be irrigated under this provision can only be irrigated after a canal has been dug from 10 to 50 miles, 10 feet wide and probably 10 feet deep.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is not the gentleman aware that this amendment is to give effect to what Congress has already ordered to be done? Congress ordered this to be done by resolution adopted in February in both Houses. That resolution passed without the opposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], I expect, and also without the opposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. We ordered it to be done, and now comes the time to appropriate the money.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is one of those things that has passed pro forma, with the statement that it takes no money; and now the fact turns out that it is ultimately intended to take an appropriation with it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not know whether it was passed pro forma; but it was passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not know whether it was passed pro forma; but if you will look at the record I have no doubt you will find it accompanied with a statement that it takes no money, and now it turns out that millions of dollars would have to be appropriated under it.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to show the difference between the House and the Senate upon this matter. Ten years ago we had several surveys in this country and at that time it was thought that it should be put under one head. Major Powell was appointed Director and instructed to make the geological surveys, to show the timber lands, the arid lands, and the mining lands and all other kinds. He was to make separate classifications. Now, we have been appropriating every year from $150,000 and $200,000 to $600,000, and much of it has been expended for the identical work provided for in this bill. Measures have passed both Houses authorizing over $637,240 appropriated to carry on the geological survey, out of which Major Powell has paid about $400,000 of the money for this identical work.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him at that point?

Mr. FORNEY. I will yield to the gentleman to correct me if I am wrong; but I am right.

Mr. SYMES. I will show the gentleman is not right in one moment. The appropriation expressly provides that $199,000 of that half a million is for the topographical branch of the survey, and one hundred odd thousand dollars is for the geological survey in the field. Now, the Director can not divert that money for this purpose.

Mr. FORNEY. Possibly he can not, but he has been——

Mr. SYMES. And a portion of that topographical survey is of use in this work, and can be utilized in locating these sites for reservoirs.

Mr. FORNEY. We have been using it for the last ten years, and last year about $100,000 was used for this identical work of ascertaining where these lands lie and how they can be irrigated. Now, the Senate go forward and say they want to increase this to $250,000 in the appropriation which they make in the bill outside of this amendment, and if we continue to make them as we have been in the past Major Powell says he can finish this work in thirty years; but the Senate go forward and make the appropriation so as to complete it in six years. That is the difference between the Senate and the House.

Mr. SYMES. He said he would accomplish the topographical survey of the United States, which is now being made, in thirty years, and it is a fact that a part of this work that ought to be done for the purposes of these reservoirs has been stopped, and he has been making surveys in the East and the West at the solicitation of members of Congress, because they all want topographical surveys made of their own States and districts.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state from the evidence of Major Powell before a Senate committee that he said he could in thirty years, with the appropriations that are now being made, if continued for the next thirty years, do the identical work which it is proposed to do under this proposition. He says if you give me $250,000 this year and a million each for the next five years, I can carry out and make the survey of that arid region and show where the head works should be established on each one of the rivers; can show where the reservoirs should be constructed, and where the canals should be dug; but that survey would not be worth anything unless the Government undertakes it or leaves it to corporations to do so. And I say that if it were done, either by corporations or by the Government, it would cost $960,000,000, and perhaps more; no one knows.

This is the entering-wedge, and after you have made the survey and got the map and ascertained where the sites should be, then you must go into this great work and make this vast expenditure. Now, I say it is not necessary for this work to be done within thirty years. There is no occasion for it. We are told that the arid region covers two-fifths of our country. Granted. The other three-fifths requires no irrigation. It is irrigated by the dews and rains of heaven, and no artificial irrigation is there required. Why, sir, outside of the arid region, in those portions of the country which do not require irrigation, we have land enough to sustain a population of three hundred millions of people, a number which we shall not reach for centuries. To-day we have, say, sixty millions of people, and even if our population should continue to increase as rapidly as it has increased for the last decade or two, we shall not have more than one hundred and twenty millions in thirty years, while, as I have said, there is territory enough outside the arid region to maintain three hundred millions of people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say this expenditure is entirely unnecessary at this time in order that at the end of thirty years we shall be able to hand down this heritage to our posterity. When the proper time comes they can go to work upon the arid region. We do not need it now. Why, sir, outside of the New England States there is not a State in this Union to-day but could support five times its present population. Take Virginia, one of the oldest of the States; she could readily maintain five times as large a population as she has to-day.

Mr. SYMES. Did not I take the position on Saturday that this was a work for the future, but that it would not do to postpone the beginning of it until a period when, under the homestead and pre-emption laws, these natural sites for reservoirs should have become private property?

Mr. FORNEY. Then, if it is a work for the future, why expend these two hundred and fifty thousand this year or five years hence?

Mr. SYMES. For the purpose of preserving these reservoirs for the future.

Mr. FORNEY. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that we do not require this expenditure at this time. It is pleasant to know that in the arid region we have 96,000,000 acres of land which, when irrigated, will be worth $30 an acre, or, as Major Powell puts it, two billions eight hundred millions. It is pleasant to know that; but we should also remember that in our country, beginning at the Atlantic coast and going west to the one hundredth meridian, where the arid region sets in, and then jumping across to the Pacific Slope, we have, as I have already said, land enough which requires no irrigation to maintain a population of 300,000,000. Therefore, sir, I hold that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that the House recede should not be adopted. The House has disagreed to this amendment and it ought to insist upon its disagreement.

But the gentleman from Kentucky says that this proposition to store the waters will solve the problem of the overflow of the Mississippi. Let us stop and think for a moment. In the first place, under this scheme no dam will be built within a thousand miles of the Mississippi River. And what about all the waters of the Missouri and of the Arkansas and of the Tennessee and of the Ohio? Major Powell himself says that the annual flow of the Ohio is greater than the annual flow of the Missouri and greater than the flow of the Upper Mississippi. It is evident, therefore, that the Mississippi will continue to overflow its banks so long as all these waters flow into it, and the only way to stop the overflow of the Mississippi is by leveeing, a work which will be accomplished by and by when our population has increased to one hundred and fifty millions.

I hope, sir, that this House will not agree to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, but will insist upon its disagreement. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the adoption of the resolution toconcur in the pending amendment put upon this bill by the Senate. We are relieved from the consideration of the main question whether the means for a more complete survey of the public lands shall be provided by the frank admission of the gentleman from Kentucky and others who have spoken in support of this motion, that the present appropriation is intended only as the first step towards an expenditure the amount of which no man ventures to prophesy, and the purpose of which is to make the United States the purveyor of a water supply to a population which the fervid imagination of gentlemen leads them to estimate at many millions. In other words, this is the commencement of another great scheme of spending the people's money in furtherance of the policy of making this a great paternal Government.

In determining whether we should enter upon it we can not get much help as legislators, though we do receive much information and entertainment from the poetical sketches of what he has seen and learned in other lands by my esteemed colleague [Mr. COX]. The Governments of Egypt, or of the Moors, or of the Sultan, or of Spain can not furnish us with any safe guides in determining what shall be the policy of our Government. The officials of those countries were the sovereigns and had most excellent reasons for lavish expenditures of the money raised by arbitrary taxes levied in the employment of the people who were their subjects. They made their governments splendid because their people were wretched.

In this country, where the people are the sovereigns and the officials the servants, there can be no such reason for splendid expenditure. The more our Government leaves the people to take care of themselves the more nearly it accomplishes the purpose for which it was created. I am not unmindful, however, that the present unfortunate condition has some resemblance to that which pertain in foreign lands when canals were built in Egypt and fountains made to gush in Constantinople. Here in these days as there in olden times the Treasury is overflowing with money gathered by an oppressive system of taxation imposed upon a people who are submitting with surprising patience to the exaction.

I believe that propositions to make such appropriations would not be entertained for one moment by either House of Congress if it were not for the unfortunate condition of our Treasury. The surplus which we all hear about, and which many of us talk about, is a constant source of temptation to the House to make extravagant appropriations and to the people to submit to them. Although this question of the existence of the surplus has been often spoken of and written about, still, sir, in the face of the proposition to make an appropriation of this character it is not amiss to recall the exact figures with regard to it.

On the 31st day of July, 1888, there had been collected and was in the Treasury of the United States $132,517,751.55 over and above every authorized expenditure for ordinary purposes which could be made by the executive department of the Government. It should not be overlooked that this is not a book-keeping surplus, but that it is actual money, the currency of the country, locked up in the vaults of the Treasury, for which the Government has no use, and which the officers charged with its custody have but a very restricted right to pay out. And it should also be understood that day by day the income of the Government exceeds the authorized expenditures and adds a further sum to this fund withdrawn from the channels of business. Under the authority given by the legislative branch of the Government the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States finds himself so placed that he has but two means of restoring to the channels of trade this accumulated and accumulating mass of the circulating medium of the country.

One method is to buy the bonds of the United States, and that method can only be pursued by paying for them a price which amounts to an advancement and payment at once by the Government of nearly one-half the entire amount of interest which would become due upon those bonds if they were left to be redeemed at maturity. And the other method is to deposit in national banks, upon their giving security by the deposit of Government bonds dollar for dollar, this accumulated currency of the country, to be by the banks loaned and used in their daily transactions. The amount so deposited was, on the 31st of July, 1888, $59,681,642.34.

It used to be thought and said that Americans were an acute people and transacted their business with a sagacity unexcelled by any class of business men in the world, and yet so stupidly has the legislation of this country failed to meet the situation which it has created that we find the Secretary of the Treasury compelled by law to receive the obligation of the Government, upon which it pays 4 per cent., and to deliver to the banks currency to the amount of their par value, and those banks having received it lend that same currency to the people, to whom it belongs, at a rate of interest running from 6 to 8 and even 12 per cent. per annum.

In other words, sir, so ridiculous, if the result were not so serious, has been our financial legislation that we are paying money into the Treasury of the United States, paying somebody 4 per cent. to borrow it from us and then paying these same people interest for the privilege of borrowing back from them our own funds. It is not to be wondered, sir, that in such a condition of the Treasury and with such limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to put back into the hands of the people the money which has been gathered together unnecessarily such schemes as that proposed by this amendment find place and supporters in our legislative bodies.

Obviously one of two things must be done, either the expenses of the Government must be increased so as to bring them up to the limit of the revenue, or else the revenue must be reduced to the limit of the expenditures. No man yet has been found bold enough to advocate in terms the first plan or even to sit still without denial under the charge that he is willing to adopt such a system. And yet, sir, it is not to be overlooked that these increased appropriations, if they are not caused by it, are at least excused by the existence of the surplus. I take it that at least in profession all political parties agree that the further accumulation of the surplus should be stopped by a reduction of the revenues. The attention of this House was pointedly called to this condition of the Treasury and this effect of existing law at the opening of this session of Congress.

The party to which I belong has responded to the call for legislation which this condition of things makes upon us by a definite proposition which has been passed by the votes of its members through this House. The bill known as the Mills bill is the response by the Democratic party to the demand for a reduction of the revenues of this country and has been subject to exhaustive debate and criticism in this House. And in view of what is happening about us, if we accept public rumor as true, it seems to me timely to call the attention of the House to the answer which events give to some of the objections which were urged against it during the general debate upon it. This House rang with denunciations of the majority and of the author of this bill because it was not sooner introduced.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], criticising the length of time taken in preparing the Mills bill, said:

> More than four months have passed and no measure looking to any avoidance of the dangers described by the President has yet been brought to a vote. His friends are in a majority here.

Since that utterance the bill and every line in it has been subjected to the most critical and exhaustive discussion in a debate which began April 17 and ended July 21.

The RECORD shows that arguments in relation to the surplus and tariff reform were addressed to the Senate in January last. The Mills bill passed this House and reached the Senate on the 23d day of July, and although the period since it formally reached that body is much shorter than elapsed during its preparation and discussion in this House, its substance was well known and there was not a feature of it or of the condition of the country to which it applies but what was fully understood and had received the careful attention of the individuals who constitute the Senate during all these months. If therefore there is an earnest desire to reduce the revenue entertained by our Republican friends, how comes it that daily we are informed by the public press that the majority of the Senate committee have postponed until next week or to some uncertain date in the future their report upon this measure? If four months was too long a time for the majority of the Ways and Means Committee to initiate a reform of our revenue laws and perfect a bill before the public and exhaustive discussion of the subject, what can be said of a delay of nearly two months in reporting upon a measure thus fully discussed and thoroughly understood before it left this House?

It was also said in regard to this bill that it was the creation of what some gentleman upon this floor termed a cabal and was approved by a caucus. The method of its preparation, adopted by a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, was the frequent and repeated source of complaint and reviling by gentlemen on the other side during its discussion. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], speaking of the Mills bill, said "that it was conceived in darkness, brought fourth in secrecy, its parentage carefully concealed," and, with assumed earnestness, asked the House "to think of a majority of a great committee of this House hiding away from the minority of that committee for six weeks, and in some secret place without consultation with the minority framing a measure involving the industrial prosperity of sixty millions of people." My colleague [Mr. BELDEN] opened his remarks by saying, "A glance at the provisions of this bill would indicate that this wonderful production of star-chamber gestation had been conceived in malice." The gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. KEAN, remarked "that it was unfortunate for the country and for the proper consideration of the tariff that this bill had its birth in secret and its cradle in a partisan caucus."

And yet, Mr. Speaker, after the Mills bill had passed this House and reached the hands of the committee of the Senate, unless common rumor lies worse than ever, it took a party caucus held under the most favorable and enlivening circumstances to enable the majority of that body to reach, doubtingly and late at night, the conclusion that an effort should be made to reduce the revenue and to report on this bill, and in accordance with the conclusion reached by that caucus the majority of that committee have met with closed doors, outside of which the minority of that committee have been compelled to stand, to consider how to reduce the revenues or rather how to destroy the Mills bill.

These events, sir, have made plain to the country if not to the members of this House how silly such criticism is, and it will be fortunate for the critics and the party of which they were the spokesmen if they escape the suspicion that the real reason for these criticisms was the hope to unfairly discredit and to delay the passage of the only measure to reduce the revenues as yet sought to be enacted.

This bill has also been criticised upon the ground that it would if enacted result in the destruction of American industries, and it is a curious fact, sir, that this assertion was as earnestly made in resisting propositions to put upon the free-list articles which were not produced by the industries of this country or with which it was impossible that there should be foreign competition as with regard to any other items in the bill.

To illustrate: one of the articles placed upon the free-list by the Mills bill was "fresh milk." No one intentionally put "fresh milk" into a tariff bill as a proper object upon which to impose a duty. It was by a blunder put into the tariff law of 1883 by falling within the terms of section 2513 A, which is in these words:

> There shall be levied, collected, and paid on the importation of all raw or unmanufactured articles not herein enumerated or provided for a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem.

When line 141 of the Mills bill "milk, fresh" was read in committee the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] arose and moved to strike out the line, and added:

> I have thus far taken no part in the debate upon the pending bill, but we are now considering a portion of the bill which makes a direct attack upon the farmers of my section and upon the farmers of the entire country—

And on this amendment after argument the committee was called upon to vote, and the amendment was rejected.

The total value of milk imported for two years past and the ports at which it was entered are shown by the following table:

Of the fresh milk entered for consumption in the year ending June 30, 1887, there was entered at—

Plattsburgh, N. Y.	$1,616
Detroit, Mich.	490
Port Huron, Mich.	999
El Paso, Tex.	720
Burlington, Vt.	377
Total	4,202

Value of imported fresh milk entered for consumption in the United States during the year ending June 30, 1888.

Ports at which entered.	Value.
Cape Vincent, N. Y.	$14.00
Plattsburgh, N. Y.	267.73
Corpus Christi, Tex.	11.00
Detroit, Mich.	1,823.00
Port Huron, Mich.	1,223.00
El Paso, Tex.	193.00
Burlington, Vt.	1,507.00
Total	5,038.73

The relative importance of such importation is best shown when I state that there was paid by the farmers of the district which I represent to the railroads as freight upon the fresh milk carried to the city of New York for consumption there (the rate of freight being 35 cents for each can containing 40 quarts) more than the sum of $900,000 in the year 1887. And yet, sir, the farmers of my section are invited to believe that their product is protected from ruinous competition with Canada by the tax upon the quantity of milk imported as above shown. They are invited to believe that the Mills bill is a direct attack upon their industry because their production upon which they pay the large amount above mentioned as freight is liable to be driven out of the New York market by the product of the pauper cows kept in Canada with its nine months of winter and three months of cold weather.

The intelligent farmers of my district will fully appreciate the force of this argument to induce them to sustain modern Republican doctrine when they contrast this munificent protection of 10 per cent. upon the importation of an article which can never come into real competition with their product with the burden of a tariff rate of 34 per cent. upon every pound of tin which enters into the utensils and cans for which they are so constantly and largely paying out their earnings. I have called attention to this particular item partly because I am familiar with facts relating to it and partly because I believe that the sincerity of the assertion that the Mills bill strikes down American industries can by it be fairly tested.

Another item placed upon the free-list by the Mills bill was ordinary building brick. It was subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, and we were informed that this bulky and comparatively cheap article would certainly be made and imported into our country and our brick-yards annihilated if it should be brought in free. And yet, sir, the fact is well known that little or no brick of the quality of ordinary building brick has been imported into this country for many years under any of our tariff laws. The bulk and weight of common brick as compared with their value are such that the freight rates for their transportation not only protect us against foreign competition but prevent competition between different neighborhoods in our own country. A haul of a few miles upon a railroad will prevent the carrying of brick from the largest yards in the Hudson River valley as against the competition of smaller yards with poorer facilities and greater running expenses but in the immediate neighborhood where the brick is needed.

In this connection I submit the following table compiled from the census of 1880 as showing the range of selling price and of labor cost of brick from 1860, with the remark that the highest selling price reached by brick and the highest wages paid to labor in this business in twenty years were attained and paid under the same rate of duty as was exacted when both items were at the lowest point:

Comparative table of tariff rates, selling price, and labor cost of brick.

State.	Year.	Rate per 1,000.	Price per 1,000.	Wages.
				Burners.	Setters.	Molders.	Common labor.
New Jersey	1860	$0.20	$8.00	$1.62	$1.62	$1.25–$1.50	$0.75–$1.10
Do	1865	.20	8.00	2.50	2.50	1.50– 2.00	1.00– 1.50
Do	1870	.20	10.00	3.50	3.00	2.25– 3.00	1.25– 2.00
New York	1871	.20	7.00	2.50	2.50	3.25	1.75
Do	1875	.20	6.00	2.00	2.00	2.75	1.50
Do	1879	.20	6.00	1.62	1.62	2.25	1.25
Do	1880	.20	7.00	2.00	2.00	2.50	1.50

I also call attention to the fact that the price for brick and the wages paid in that business vary from year to year in such a way as to preclude the idea that either was at all dependent upon the effect of tariff legislation.

An examination of the statistics of brick importation demonstrates that in recent years the brick imported into this country were glazed or otherwise decorated and expensive brick.

I also submit to the House the following table showing the exports of common brick from this country for twenty years past:

Quantity and value of building bricks exported from the United States for the years ending June 30, 1870 to 1888, inclusive.

Years.	Building bricks.

1873	1,219,000	10,632
1874	1,347,000	11,290
1875	1,451,000	12,120

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, August 27, 1888.
WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. H. BACON,
House of Representatives.

We exported and sold these large quantities of brick made by our higher-priced labor, maintained, say the opponents of this measure, by the duty, in competition with all the world and its cheaper labor. Of course the exporters of these brick did not export them for fun; they exported and made a profit on them; and yet intelligent men are asked to believe that the removal of the duty on imported brick will compel our manufacturers to give up the home market to the very men whom they successfully met and overcame in open competition in the foreign market.

Mr. Speaker, with the knowledge which these statistics give us of the entire inutility of an import duty on the article of common brick either to sustain its price or the rate of wages paid to labor employed in its manufacture, we heard here from gentlemen on the other side eloquent and pathetic appeals to strike out the provision putting brick on the free-list in order to save this industry from ruin. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that from this example we can learn the groundlessness of the expressions of fear, the idleness of the prophecies of ruin to American industries as the result of the passage of the Mills bill, with the repetition of which our ears have been so frequently assailed.

The theory upon which the Mills bill was constructed, so far as it affected the tariff, was that the surplus revenue now collected by the Government should be reduced by taking off the duties paid upon the necessaries of life and of what are denominated raw material, to the end that not only might money not needed for the legitimate expenses of the Government be kept out of the Treasury, but that the people of the country might receive the necessaries of life relieved from the extra charge made necessary by the payment of duties. The President in his annual message said that these duties added to the cost to the consumer of the article subject to duty, and there has been no portion of his message and no argument in favor of this bill, so strenuously attacked and denied as this plain statement of a fact which can not be the subject of fair contradiction. If our manufacturers do not enhance the cost of the articles that they sell to the consumer by reason of the amount of duty paid upon the foreign goods before they are admitted into this country, what possible protection can the tariff afford to the American manufacturer?

The only argument in favor of a protective tariff is that by reason of the exclusion of competition with the foreign manufacturer our manufacturer is enabled to enhance his price and thereby to pay enhanced wages to his employés. He enhances his price by an amount exactly or approximately equivalent to what it costs the foreign manufacturer to place his goods upon the American market. In fact, he adds every time to the cost of the foreign product in the markets abroad the items of freight, insurance, and tariff rates in order to determine the amount at which he will sell his own product. It affords no reply to this plain business proposition to say that as compared with twenty years ago manufactured products in this country are sold at vastly reduced prices. That is conceded, but the question is not whether prices have tended downward for twenty years in this country.

The question as to whether the tariff duty increases the cost to the consumer in this country is to be settled not by a comparison of the prices in this country now and twenty years ago, but by a comparison between the prices at the present time in this country and in the country from which the goods would be imported were it not for the duty. Any such comparison, sir, will demonstrate the entire accuracy of the statement that this duty enhances the price of all commodities to the consumer in this country.

I submit herewith a table, prepared with the aid of the Bureau of Statistics, as sustaining the proposition that the tariff rate does enhance the cost of the commodities to the consumer:

Export prices of the below-named articles in England, Germany, France, and the United States in 1877 and 1886, with rate of duty in the United States.

One of the advantages which the opponents of the Mills bill claim as the result of a high rate of duty is a steady reduction in the price of all commodities. That there has been this steady reduction is not disputed, but that it results from the high rate of duty is not only denied but disproved. I submit the following table to show that during the past twenty years in the article of cotton cloth there has been a steady reduction in price, in England as well as in this country, and that in the last ten years the reduction there has been greater than it has been here.

But, Mr. Speaker, it has been insisted that the revenues of this country should not be reduced by the reduction of the rate of import duties for the reason that the inevitable result of such reduction will be injurious to labor and will diminish the price at which it is compensated in this country. And those who oppose this measure of reduction are fond of calling attention to what they assert to be the vastly higher rate of wages paid in this country than that paid in foreign countries, and ascribe the whole of the difference between the rates of wages in the different countries to the effect of a protective tariff. The question to be determined is not whether wages are higher in this country than in other countries, but why are they higher.

My own conviction is that tariff taxation can no more increase the wages paid in a country than it can increase the amount of grain which will grow upon an acre of land in the same country. And in support of that conclusion I call attention to the fact that comparing the prices paid for wages in foreign lands we find that the wages paid in England, a free-trade country, are higher than those paid in Germany, a country having a protective tariff system, or in Italy, which is also a country with a protective tariff, or in France, which is also a country with a protective tariff. Again, comparing the wages paid in this country with the wages paid in England, it will be found that while the rate of daily wages in this country is higher than that paid in England, that the excess paid in this country anywhere, and in any occupations connected with the important manufactures, is but a small proportion of the amount of the ad valorem rate of duty upon the commodities imported into this country.

It will also be found by comparing the wages within this country itself and in its different States, although all of them alike have whatever benefit there can be in our tariff system, yet the difference in wages between the various States for labor in the same occupation and of the same grade is very great. Now, sir, if the high rate of wages in this country were created or sustained solely by the tariff, can anybody satisfactorily explain why labor in this country is not paid uniform wages in all parts of it? Again, comparing the wages of men employed in business connected with commodities which are protected with those in business connected with commodities not protected, the fact will be found to be that, excluding unskilled labor, the daily wage of the latter class is quite generally higher than that of the former.

To institute still another comparison, it will be found that the variation in wages between different parts of this country is greater than the variation in wages paid in many parts of this country and in Great Britain in the same occupation.

This latter fact, which is incontestable, can be explained away, as it seems to me, upon no theory consistent with the statement that a high rate of wages paid in this country is due to the existence of a tariff tax. In discussing this question of wages to this point I have confined myself to a comparison of the daily wages paid, but it is obvious that in determining why wages are higher in one country than another the true test will be found in a comparison of the labor cost in the various articles produced in the two countries. That is, the labor of the two countries should be compared by a consideration of their productive values. But some man will say the laborer is not interested in the question of a comparison of the labor cost in different countries, provided he gets more money in one country than in the other. If the laborer was seeking to ascertain the fact whether he got more money or not, the question of comparison of labor cost would be unimportant; but in seeking to determine why he gets more money he will understand that it is important to know the relative effectiveness of the two kinds of labor; for it is obvious that whether there is a tariff or not a manufacturer can better afford to pay a man $2 a day who produces $5 worth of work than he can to pay a man $1 a day who produces $2 worth of work. With or without any tariff the better workman will command the better wages.

That the labor of the American workmen is more productive than that of the workmen of other countries is a fact to which so much testimony has been borne from time to time by different men of different parties that those who deny it are compelled to contradict the eloquent testimony of most of the leaders of the Republican party.

I submit the following table as showing the variations in different parts of our country in the price paid for labor and in the percentage of labor cost in certain lines of manufactures:

The House will observe that in the manufacture of cotton-print cloth, while the same labor made 120.6 per cent. more product in 1884 than it did in 1849, there has been only an increase of 50 per cent. in wages, and to obviate the criticism that cotton cloth is not a fair test, I call attention to the fact that in the manufacture of cassimeres, while the increase of production is 113.3 per cent. from 1858 to 1886, the increase in wages of labor is only 42.9 per cent. Mr. Speaker, how can it be argued that, when the actual value of labor to the manufacturer by reason of the amount of product has in both the instances cited more than doubled while the wages have only increased 50 per cent., the high wages paid American workmen are due to tariff legislation?

The tariff of 1856 as applied to woolen manufactures was much lower than the tariff of to-day or the tariff proposed by the Mills bill, but the wages have not only not been increased in proportion to their increase in value, but have fallen far below it under the supposed benefits of a protective system. If we keep before us clearly that the question to be asked, discussed, and answered is not whether wages are higher in one country than in another, but why they are higher, the importance of these figures and of the facts which they demonstrate is clearly shown.

It seems to me, then, that whether we undertake to determine this question of why wages are higher by a comparison between the wages paid in foreign countries having varying rates of duty or by a comparison between the wages paid in our own country and in the countries of Europe, or by a comparison of wages paid for the same kind of labor in different sections of our own country, or by a comparison of wages paid in our own country in different kinds of business, some directly protected, some unprotected, or whether we test it by the much fairer test of the comparative value of labor, judged by the amount it produces, there can be but one conclusion reached, and that is that the rate of wages paid in any country is not determined by its relations with other countries, but solely by the internal conditions of the country itself, the demand for labor, the opportunity for productive paying employment.

So long, sir, as this country possesses a vast domain of public lands, preserved by vigilant executive officers for settlement by its citizens, so long as the population is scanty and labor is in demand, so long will the price of labor remain high in this country; and in exact proportion as these public lands are absorbed and the population becomes dense the rate of daily wages will decline. We can say, and it is a just source of pride to members of my party, that since this Administration came into power it has prolonged the time when our public lands shall be open to settlement by poor men, by the restoration of large tracts of such lands to the public domain. But whenever these lands shall have been absorbed, whenever the same conditions exist here that exist in Europe, then, and not until then, will the rate of wages in this country sink to a European level.

Not only is the Government of the United States collecting more money by taxation than it needs, but by reason of it it is, to a large extent, responsible for the existence of various forms of combination, including most of those which have come to be known as trusts. It has been my duty, sir, under the order of this House, to devote the greater portion of my time during the present session of Congress to the investigation of the methods of business and forms of organization of such combinations. The modern business combination called a trust has come into existence in various kinds of business, but in all cases it will be found that one or two conditions existed in each kind of business anterior to the trust and was the inducing cause that led up to its formation.

Either the supply of the chief article purchased in such business as its raw material was limited or the demand for the chief article produced therein was limited and did not exceed if it equaled the supply. A monopoly—for after all that is what is intended to be accomplished by these trusts—could not be preserved where either the supply of the raw material was unlimited or the demand for the finished product remained unlimited, i. e., greater than the supply. The limitation, however, may come from natural causes, or it may come from the interference by legislation with the operation of natural laws.

The Standard Oil trust is an instance of a trust which has grown up because of a limitation arising from natural causes, i. e., because the source of supply of crude oil which is the article it buys is restricted to a small area. The early efforts of the combination which has developed into the Standard Oil trust were successfully directed to obtaining control of the transportation facilities necessary to bring the supply produced in this limited area to the points where the demand for it and for the refined product is general, and it has carried on that effort until to-day, practically, the whole of the crude petroleum passes into its custody, or under its control, the moment it leaves the earth. If oil, like wheat, was produced everywhere, there would have been no possibility of and no profit in the trust.

But the Standard Oil trust as a combination of corporations refining crude petroleum has an immense advantage over all competitors when, availing itself of the opportunity growing out of the limited source of supply, it takes into its possession and under its control the raw material which its competitors as well as its corporations must use. For the creation of this trust, therefore, the taxing laws of the country are not in any way responsible.

The sugar trust, however, was formed because the tariff law of this country is such as to place a limit both upon the demand for sugar refined here and upon the supply of refined sugar which might be brought here from abroad to compete with the American article. The duty imposed upon raw sugar, which is the article bought by our refiners, and a sufficient supply of which is produced within the limits of our own country, makes it impossible for our refineries to compete in the markets of the world with the refined sugars of England, France, and Germany with their systems of free trade or bounties, and hence limits the demand for the products of our refineries to our own markets.

Their productive capacity has become largely in excess of this demand, and hence it became necessary, in order to maintain the profits of that business, to organize a trust by means of which production could be limited, competition prevented, and prices regulated and sustained. The price of refined sugars has steadily advanced since the formation of this trust, and this advance has not been accompanied, and hence has not been occasioned by a corresponding advance in the cost of raw sugar. The advance in refined sugars therefore simply represents an additional profit to the refiners and an additional burden upon the whole body of the people. The almost complete monopoly of the American market possessed by the corporations which are controlled by the sugar trust has, in this instance, worked out its natural effect an enhancement of price to the consumer not resulting from any enhanced cost of production to the manufacturer.

This trust not only came into existence by reason of the limitations of the demand for its product created by our tariff laws, but its power to thus unreasonably enhance its profits by increasing disproportionately the difference in price between raw and refined sugars is also derived from the same legislation because it limits the supply of refined sugars which can be imported. In this instance the limitation is the direct result of interference by national legislation with natural laws, for if the tariff laws were so modified as by the Mills bill it is proposed they shall be, that the rate of duty imposed upon refined sugar fit for consumption was more nearly equal to the rate upon raw sugar, the sugar trust would find itself compelled to reduce the price charged for refined sugar, or foreign sugars fit for consumption could be introduced and profitably sold in our market duty paid.

This trust with its power to do mischief and oppress is not largely or at all a private affair with which the Government of this country has no particular right to interfere, but its power is the direct result of laws enacted by Congress fixing the rates of duty upon the various classes of sugar. The destruction of its power to oppress is not only a matter of public concern and duty, but it is practically not difficult to accomplish. Of course the sugar-refining business and the sugar-growing business of the country can be destroyed together by placing sugar of all grades upon the free-list.

It may seem wise to some gentlemen to pursue that method. But as I understand the policy of my party it is, while reducing taxation to a point where it will produce only revenue enough to pay the expenses of the Government economically administered, where the people will be relieved from all unnecessary burdens by reason of it, and where the existence of trusts as the results of legislative interference with the laws of trade will be made impossible, to so wisely and judiciously reduce rates of duty as not to destroy and not to seriously disturb any business or the employment of labor in any business.

The remedy for the existence of any power to oppress by the sugar trust is not to disturb materially the rate of duty upon raw sugar, but to diminish the rate of duty upon refined sugar, and by that term I mean to include all sugars in a condition for consumption to a point that will render it impossible for the sugar trust or any similar combination to put the price of refined sugar at an unreasonably high figure in this country without bringing it immediately into competition with the product of the refineries of England, Germany, and France. Such a course will at once preserve the sugar growing and sugar refining industries of the country and permit them to continue their business and the employment of labor, and at the same time prevent the people from being subjected to exorbitant charges for this necessary article of food. What I have stated with regard to the sugar trust I believe correctly describes the conditions which have led to the creation of most of the other trusts existing in this country. The instances in which the limitation of either supply or demand arises from natural causes are few and with few exceptions unimportant.

The remedy, therefore, for the evil arising from such combinations can be found in such a modification of the tariff laws as will open the markets of the United States to the world whenever American manufacturers, united by combination or in a trust, put an unreasonably high figure upon any commodity which they produce. Such a modification will also release the United States from its quasi, and to it unprofitable, copartnership with the managers of the trusts.

There have been other remedies for the regulation of these trusts suggested. Most of them seem, however, to have been suggested without reflecting upon or perhaps clearly knowing the peculiar form or organization which the modern trust adopts. That form of organization was carefully and accurately described in a report submitted to this House by the Committee on Manufactures, of which I have the honor to be chairman, but it will not be amiss here, sir, to briefly recall the leading features of it.

These modern trusts are not incorporated under the laws of any State and are restricted to a combination of the stocks of independent corporations existing under charters granted by several States. They leave the corporations in the various States independent, each carrying on, under the laws of the States and subject to their correction, its business. They put the stock of the corporations into the hands of trustees, who thus become owners of the controlling interests in the corporations, and the dividends of the corporations are paid to the trustees as stockholders, and are by them distributed to the holders of the trust certificates. By this device, sir, these creatures of the statutes of the State corporations remain undisturbed as the buyers and sellers and dealers with the public. They are not combined. Any law which prohibits the combinations of persons or corporations to deal in articles for the purpose of limiting the production or regulating the price of the commodity will fail, in my judgment, of accomplishing its purpose of destroying these trusts, because the corporations are not in any combination and their individuality and separate existence is carefully preserved.

The combination or pooling of the stock is a matter with which it is difficult to see how the Federal Government can interfere. The right to issue stock and the rights of stockholders grow out of State legislation, and the States granting those rights having imposed no condition upon the use to be made of the stock or upon the stockholders pooling or combining their holdings, it is not easy to see how the Federal Congress can prohibit any use that the owner of stock may lawfully make of his certificates under the State law which authorized their issue. This particular form of organization has become possible, because in these days we have strayed so far away from the limitations which, by the wisdom of the fathers, used to be imposed upon the granting of corporate charters that we have grown forgetful of their nature.

The charter of a corporation is a privilege granted by a sovereign and carries with it many attributes of the sovereign, notably the power of self-perpetuation, the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, the freedom of the persons who actually transact the business from any personal liability for the obligations and contracts which they lawfully make in the name of the corporation. It was always the custom in earlier days to grant these charters as a special privilege and because they were supposed and intended to serve a public purpose. Every charter in this country was then granted by a special act of some State Legislature. As the result of this practice there grew up many charges of legislative corruption in connection with the granting of charters, and these charges became so frequent that they threw disgrace upon our whole legislative system.

To avoid this evil the States have pretty uniformly authorized individuals, upon compliance with a few formalities, to clothe themselves with charter privileges, until now the rule is that charters, instead of being granted for some public purpose, are obtained as the easiest means of transacting private business. The free granting of charters has become so much a matter of course that we have forgotten that each one of them is a little piece of the sovereignty of the people chipped off and donated to some individual, and that in giving to any individual any portion of the sovereign authority we are conferring a power which is capable of being used for the selfish advancement of its possessor and against the public welfare.

As a result of this lax usage it has come about that the right of the holders to transfer and combine for their own selfish interest, without regard to public welfare, certificates of stock in corporations, is assumed to be almost, if not quite, a natural right not subject to regulation by the Government. If, as a result of the formation of these trusts, the attention of the people shall be called to the fact that a corporate charter and the rights of stockholders under it are not natural but artificial rights, created by the laws of the States and justifiable only when they serve a public interest, the trusts will have unintentionally performed a useful function.

The time will come, in my opinion, when it will be found best to return to a policy of restricting the granting of charters to such lines of business as public rather than private interests make it desirable should be carried on by corporations and to restrict the powers of stockholders to combine their holdings. Should such a policy be adopted, the form of trust organizations, which is at present most menacing to the public welfare, will disappear. The efforts of men to so combine their business as to enable them to make unreasonable and oppressive profits will not cease with their disappearance.

The modern trust has been devised and used as a method of combination because it is a way made easy and safe by legislation to reach the result of oppressing the people. It is not the only way. A striking illustration of the truth of this statement is afforded by what has recently taken place in the cotton-bagging business. There is no trust organization in this business. The Government of the United States put a rate of duty on cotton bagging which was practically prohibitory. The raw material which is used in its manufacture is a product of India. This particular infant industry has been nurtured by high rates of duty until the mills are able to produce in a portion of the year more than enough to supply the market for the whole year, and the price has been run down in former years until it was not profitable to import the article.

The competitors of our mills were originally at Dundee, Scotland, and at Calcutta. The Dundee mills no longer make the article of cotton bagging or have ready for use the machinery to manufacture it. It takes about three or four months to bring it from Calcutta. This being the situation of the market the manufacturers and jobbers, dealers in the article, early in this year entered into a combination by which the control of the whole of the production of the American manufacturers passed into the hands of a few men. It was in form a sale of the product, it was in fact a combination of manufacturers. The managers left the price undisturbed until in July last, and then, there being no bagging in Dundee, and it being impossible to bring any from Calcutta in time to cover this year's crop of cotton, they have doubled the price and put it far beyond that at which the Calcutta bagging can be profitably imported and promise to still further increase it at their pleasure.

This industry, which has been protected into existence, has grown so great that it makes no concealment of its power or purpose to use the monopoly the tariff laws have given it to oppress and to put under contribution the growers of the entire cotton crop of the country. One of the largest and most valuable of the agricultural products of this country can not reach the market until this band of cotton-bagging manufacturers has levied toll upon it. Is this combine, which derives every particle of its power from the laws passed by Congress, which demands the surrender of its victims in the name of labor and the Congress of the United States, a purely private enterprise with which the Government has no right to interfere? Mr. Speaker, the Government gave it power to oppress, the Government can take it away. The Government is responsible for the oppression, and must remain so as long as it fails to take away the power so shamefully misused.

Mr. Speaker, it may seem shrewd politics to prophesy smooth things to those who are interested in the preservation of trusts and combines, and to say of them that they are largely private matters with which the Government can not interfere. But the strong, sound sense of the people will detect the fallacy and discover the unworthy reason for its utterance.

The situation at present in the cotton-bagging business enables us also to foresee what the condition of the people of this country would become should the modern Republican doctrine of prohibitory duties be adopted as the policy of the Government. Here is an article which has been protected by what is practically a prohibitory duty. All imports of it have ceased.

We have here a case of American labor protected to the point which, according to the theories of gentlemen on the other side, should produce at once the highest rate of wages to the laborer and the lowest cost to the consumer. And yet, most unfortunately for these theories of the approaching millennium, the managers of this combine have not increased the wages of their laborers, have shut up many factories, thrown out of employment the operators, bought the bagging of the mills at from 5¼ to 6¼ cents a yard, and are exacting for it from the cotton-grower, rich and poor alike, from 11 to 12½ cents per yard. Last year they sold the same material made by the same labor and in the same mills for 7¼ cents per yard. The amount estimated to be needed for covering this year's crop is forty-five and a half millions of yards. The amount, therefore, which this combination proposes shall be exacted beyond a reasonable profit is, this year, $2,275,000.

This is the result of prohibitory duties and of the consequent combinations in one industry. Will the country be persuaded that it will be benefited by a similar condition in other industries? To prevent such combinations, or at least any Government connection with them, it will be at all times necessary that the rates of duty imposed by our tariff system should be so regulated as to free the people from the possibility of an unreasonable enhancement of prices by manufacturers located within our country and engaged in the production of articles which the people must use. This power to oppress can always be destroyed by fixing the rates of duty at such a figure as will not destroy the business, but will prevent any combination from making unfairly high prices for its products without inviting foreign competition.

The Mills bill, as it passed the House, seemed to me to be a wise, conservative, and certain step forward toward stopping the accumulation of a surplus, reducing the taxation of the country to the limits of the proper expenditures of the Government, and relieving the people from the threatened oppression of combinations and trusts.

If it is not a good one, why has not some other been suggested? From the other side of this House there has come but one such proposition, and it was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], and is in these words:

> Mr. KELLEY. Hear my proposition first, and then I will submit to any interruption. I am not asking an immediate reply to my suggestion, nor does its presentation involve any of my associates in responsibility. I alone am responsible for submitting it to the consideration of the House. I believe that in submitting it to the consideration of gentlemen good results will flow from the proposition; but whatever be the result, I alone am responsible for my action. I repeat that whether we consider methods of action or results, the issue between the two parties is sharply defined and complete.
> Now, sir, my suggestion is that the bill shall be laid over until the next session of Congress, with the understanding that if at the November election it shall be distinctly approved by the people the Republican party will withdraw its opposition. If, on the other hand, it is condemned unmistakably by the voters, that the bill shall not be further pressed.
> This proposition leaves the question of the surplus undisposed of, and I have a suggestion on that subject which will require of the President's supporters a slight concession to the "condition that confronts us." It is that they shall allow the entire internal tax on tobacco to be repealed, and instead of making two bites of that cherry and repealing only about eighteen millions of the thirty-one millions drived from the internal taxes on tobacco, shall permit the entire repeal.

It was promptly repudiated by his associates, and with that repudiation it died. Since that time, through all these long months, this excessive, unnecessary, and therefore wicked taxation has gone on. The surplus has accumulated, and as the result of it schemes for spending it, extravagant and useless as the one under consideration, have found their way into the Houses of Congress, and their passage has been eagerly sought. If the gentlemen upon the other side have any other method of relief, if they can suggest something upon which they are agreed to the country, why has it not ere this been suggsted?

If the Mills bill is wrong why has not a correct one, upon which the gentlemen upon the other side agree, found its way into one or the other of the two Houses? Assuredly it can not be claimed that it has been for want of time, for want of opportunity for consultation, for want of having their attention directed to the subject. Why, I ask, if it is really desired by the other side that this taxation should be reduced and the accumulating of a surplus brought to an end, why have the efforts upon the other side resulted only in the criticisms of the provisions of this bill in a policy of not doing nor assisting in doing what the necessities of the country require? The question which I put to the House is one that must be answered, if not here, elsewhere, before the end of this Presidential campaign. It is no answer to it to pile adjectives and epithets one upon another. The country demands some measure of practical relief.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House because, in my opinion, this is one of the most important propositions that have come before it during the present session. It certainly involves, or will eventually involve, the expenditure of a much larger sum of money than has been contemplated in any other scheme of this kind we have been called upon to consider; and if we enter upon it now there will be, I think, no halting. Looking back carefully over the expenditures made by this Government and the different schemes which have from time to time been adopted, I do not remember a case, except one, in which, having entered upon a regular scheme for the expenditure of money, Congress has ever stopped that expenditure.

It seems that these expenditures grow stronger in their claims upon Congress in proportion as they grow larger and more burdensome upon the people. The one case in which Congress did call a halt and did abolish a bureau which it had established was in 1852. At that time there was a geological survey which had been in existence for some years, and it was then abolished by Congress, but I am sorry to say it has since been recommenced on a much larger scale. I challenge gentlemen on the other side to point me to a single instance, with the exception I have named, in which Congress ever did stop the expenditure of money for any scheme upon which it had once entered.

Mr. CANNON. I can give the gentleman a very notable case. Congress virtually abolished the national board of health because of its inefficiency and extravagance.

Mr. HERBERT. I had forgotten that. Congress did abolish that; but it had not gotten strong enough to stand on its own legs. At the time it was abolished only one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars a year was being expended.

A MEMBER. It merely failed to appropriate for it.

Mr. HERBERT. Well, failing to appropriate for it was abolishing it. I give Congress credit for the virtue it displayed in that instance, but I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will agree with me that the rule is as I have stated it, that once having started to spend money in a certain direction we never stop. Look at the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum, the Ethnological Bureau, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Geological Survey itself, in the brain of whose chief this scheme we are now discussing was hatched.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman pardon me for a suggestion. This scheme was not "hatched" in the brain of the Director of the Geological Survey; it was hatched in conventions of the people throughout the arid regions, which have called attention to the necessity of saving the natural sites for reservoirs from the grasp of private corporations and reserving them for the homesteaders of the future.

Mr. HERBERT. When were those conventions held?

Mr. SYMES. During the past winter there have been several conventions held, and they have been held from time to time for years.

Mr. HERBERT. For how many years?

Mr. PETERS. For about six years.

Mr. SYMES. There have been such conventions held for about six years, I think, in the States and Territories of the arid region.

Mr. HERBERT. This Geological Survey has been in existence for about ten years, and ever since its inception its Director has had this scheme in his mind. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] say that for six years the people out there have been advocating this scheme in conventions. Let me now call attention to what the Director of the Geological Survey said upon this subject four years ago. I happened to be upon a joint commission of the two Houses which investigated the scientific surveys, as they are called, from 1884 to 1886, and I have here the more than 1,000 pages of evidence we took during that investigation. I wish to call attention to the testimony of Major Powell. Let me, however, premise by stating that prior to 1879 there had been four different surveys in the Rocky Mountain region, Major Powell conducting one of them. In 1879 they were all abolished, or rather they were consolidated into one. Of that one, after the first year, Major Powell became the Director. He certainly knew the purpose for which the Geological Survey was organized and the objects it had in view, and testifying in 1884 he said:

> This survey "is investigating the floods in valleys of the great rivers, like that of the Mississippi, for the purpose of determining the conditions under which they can be redeemed. It is investigating the conditions under which the arid regions may be most economically fertilized by irrigation."

Since the establishment of this bureau it has been all the time considering this problem, and when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] state that this scheme has originated with conventions which have been held within the past six years, I simply answer them with the fact that this Geological Bureau has been considering the matter for nine years. Now, I ask the House: Is not the proof conclusive of the correctness of my statement that the idea originated with the Director of the Geological Survey? Certainly it did if he has stated correctly the purposes he has had in view since the very beginning of that bureau.

Now, upon this matter so important to the country there is no evidence at all before the House except the testimony of Major Powell. I do not want to make any personal attack upon him and I shall not do it. I have great respect for his ability. He has great knowledge; he is a great talker; he is a man of great power, even, as I think, over Congress. But I submit that this House ought not to enter upon a scheme involving so large an expenditure on the unsupported opinion of one man, on the opinion of Major Powell alone. When we were investigating the Geological Survey five years ago and inquiring as to the time it would take to complete it, this question was put to the Director by the chairman (page 43):

> Q. Twelve years, did you say, or twenty-four to complete it?
> A. Twenty-four. I have given that as the longest time.

Now, mark you, gentlemen, at that time, while he was getting a little more for printing than now, he was getting not quite so much for the other purposes of the survey, including topography, and he then testified that twenty-four years was the longest possible time that would be required for the completion of the work. He was asked the same question recently before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and in reply he said:

We are going on with that map, and in thirty years we shall have it done as we are going on now.

That is to say, four years ago he said he would have the work done in twenty-four years, and now, four years later, he adds six years to the time required. In other words, he corrects his former calculation by ten years. Then it was to last till 1908; now it is to last till 1918. It is like the old school-boy problem of the frog in the well: How long would it take him to get to the top if he only climbed up 4 feet in the day and fell back 6 feet at night?

Sir, if we admit that this scheme is practicable, if we admit that everything can be accomplished that is claimed, if we believe what its ardent advocates contend for, then indeed it is a scheme of surpassing grandeur.

Only leave out of consideration the cotton-growers of the South and the wheat-growers of the West and all the tax-payers of the country, consider it solely with reference to its being a great problem, a problem, as my friend on my left [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky] views it, in which this country is to be interested at some time in the great future when we shall have a population of four or five hundred millions—I say, if you consider it in that light, it is, to use the language of my friend from New York [Mr. COX], the grandest scheme in the history of progressive humanity.

But is it feasible, and if it is feasible who is to accomplish it? Let us not deceive ourselves about the facts. The gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER], who argued in favor of it, is right. He said that private enterprise could not do it; that in the history of the world, going back to the remotest times and coming down to the present, there never had been an instance in which a great scheme like this was carried out by private enterprise. He is undoubtedly right. It is absolutely impracticable for private individuals to do it. Let us look at it for a moment. I see published in the RECORD a letter from Governor Thayer, of Nebraska, addressed to Senators MANDERSON and PADDOCK and Representative MCSHANE, of the State of Nebraska. In that letter he goes on just as the gentleman from California did this morning to argue in favor of the Government doing this work. He sets forth, without addressing himself particularly to that point, incontrovertible reasons to show that private enterprise can not do it. He complains that the river Platte, which runs down through the northeast part of Colorado into Nebraska, is entirely absorbed by the people of Colorado, and never gets down to the people of his State. He contends that the people of Nebraska have the same natural right to use this water of the Platte that the people of Colorado have, and the governor is sustained by a maxim of law almost as old as the law itself, aqua currit et debet currere—water runs and ought to run.

He is complaining of the people of Colorado who use up the waters of the Platte and will not let it run down so that people of his State can use it.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman pardon me if I ask him a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, if it is relevant. I hope the gentleman will not take me off my line of argument.

Mr. SYMES. The experience of the Western country, of the people on the lower waters of the Platte and Arkansas, is that irrigation and the storage of water for irrigation increases the flow of water below in those streams during the dry season. It flows down into the States of Nebraska and Arkansas more regularly during the dry season than formerly.

Mr. HERBERT. Then you think the governor is wrong?

Mr. SYMES. The governor is undoubtedly wrong if he disputes this. Perhaps he has never investigated the subject and knows little about it.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Colorado arguing for this bill on this floor may know more about it than the governor of Nebraska, who is in the State of Nebraska arguing from that standpoint for the bill.

Mr. SYMES. He is arguing to meet the complaint of some new farmers who have gone beyond the rain-line and expect more water in the river than ever was found there by the pioneers in the dry season, when they crossed it on their way to California.

Mr. HERBERT. You say they have not absorbed the water?

Mr. SYMES. They have absorbed the water by diverting much of it, but by a law which I can not explain in a minute it passes back into the stream below, and to such an extent during low water that there is more water in the lower portions of the stream during the dry season.

Mr. HERBERT. This is a fine theory, but unfortunately the advocates of the bill do not agree with it.

Mr. SYMES. It is the absolute fact and proved by pioneers who live on the stream itself.

Mr. FELTON. With the gentleman's permission, I will say that there is a part of the San Joaquin valley where you could not get water in many places without digging wells 20 to 30 feet, and when that country was irrigated for ten or twelve years you could get water in wells at a depth of 5 or 6 feet. The irrigation of that country does not require over 25 per cent. what it did when the system was first commenced. The earth is simply a vast sponge or reservoir, holding the water from evaporation; water which fills it from these irrigating canals or ditches. There is no question but that the gentleman from Colorado is correct, therefore. I have seen it with my own eyes. It is simply a storage of water which would otherwise make its way rapidly to the sea.

Mr. HERBERT. It is a remarkable thing that the governor of Nebraska should address a letter to the Senators from that State, and that one of them should use it in the debate on this amendment, and never ascertain that it was inaccurate.

Mr. SYMES. The Senator [Mr. MANDERSON] who used it spoke in favor of this amendment, and advocated storing the water in Colorado.

Mr. HERBERT. I know he did; of course he did; and I suppose every gentleman in the whole arid region if he had an opportunity would speak in favor of the bill and vote for it. He is almost bound to do it, because it simply asks for an appropriation of money to fertilize by water that arid region he represents. Sir, it would amount to just the same thing if these gentlemen should come and ask an appropriation of money to buy any other fertilizer and put it on their lands and tax the people of the East to pay for it, for that is what it amounts to.

Mr. SYMES. Pardon me a moment; we are not proposing to irrigate Nebraska. That is one of the richest States in the whole world without irrigation except a narrow strip on the western border.

Mr. HERBERT. In this connection let me state what I have seen myself. I had occasion to go down the River Platte some years ago in the direction of Omaha from Denver, and found after I left Denver that the Platte River, which at Denver was quite a bold stream of water, some hundred miles below practically dried up. I found cattle all along the way for this hundred miles; the water was impounded in pools for watering stock. Sir, it would never occur to me from what I then saw to question now the information of Governor Thayer. From what I saw with my own eyes I should never say that he did not know what he was talking about.

Now, sir, let me ask the gentleman from Colorado a question. Is it not true that all along the river Platte below Denver there are pools after pools for watering stock and for the irrigation of the farms lying along the river, and is it not also true that the Platte vanishes in dry seasons below the points where the water is used in this way?

Mr. SYMES. There is found more water in the lower Platte River now during every dry season than ever was found there by the pioneers who crossed over in 1849 to 1859 going to California. That can be proved to be an absolute fact. The system of which the gentleman complains has simply increased the volume of the river below during the dry season; after the water is spread out and absorbed it percolates through the earth and finds its way again into the stream below.

Mr. HERBERT. But the gentleman does not answer my question. Is the water not impounded in pools before it reaches Nebraska?

Mr. SYMES. I answer the gentleman by stating the facts. If you go right below the point where several large irrigating ditches have been opened up you will find that the water has been drawn off from the river and the channel is practically dry. This water has been carried to the adjacent farms. It is spread over the lands and sinks into the soil which holds it like a vast sponge; and by some process, which I have not time now to explain, it passes through the earth and eventually finds its way again into the stream below, and when it reaches Nebraska the volume of water is larger under the present system during the dry season than it was before these irrigating ditches and reservoirs were constructed. It causes a larger flow of the river on the surface of the streams than the pioneers ever found in the early days when passing through that region, and this is due to natural causes. It is not evaporated, but it is retained in the earth and distributes itself during the dry season.

Mr. HERBERT. And the gentleman thinks it is right for his constituents in Colorado to stop the flow of water and shut it off in pools and reservoirs and keep it for their cattle and farms, and let Governor Thayer's constituents in Nebraska wait until the sun of heaven kindly draws up the water and carries it down to them in the shape of clouds and rain?

Mr. SYMES. I certainly did not say so; but I have explained the fact that it increases the continued flow of the river during the dry season. There is not quite so much water in the river below during the wet season, for it is retained to some extent in the reservoirs, but in the dry season they have more.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, without occupying further time in this line of discussion, I desire to come back to the argument I was pursuing, simply saying that Governor Thayer does not agree with the gentleman from Colorado. I was using Governor Thayer's letter for the purpose of showing that the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER] was absolutely right when he said the Government would have to do this work; that private individuals could not. The reasons clearly appear from what the governor of Nebraska says:

These people—

That is your constituents—

have the physical power to take those waters, and it is freely conceded that there is not at present any legal means by which their power can be restrained.

Mr. SYMES. Pardon me. I would say, as I did the other day, that the most of the current supply of the Platte River is already appropriated. What we mean by the "current supply" is during the growing season——

Mr. HERBERT. What the gentleman says has nothing to do with the point I am making. The point is, if there was any chance of succeeding in a suit against the parties indicated by Governor Thayer, such suit would be instituted. But there is no one against whom suit can be brought, because these persons who do what is complained of are very numerous, and the wrong, if wrong it be, is distributed among so many people that there is nobody to sue. The people living nearer to the headwaters of the Platte are getting the water and controlling and preventing the water, as Governor Thayer thinks, from coming down to the State of Nebraska. That, he says, is a wrong for which there is no remedy. It is that private individuals could not undertake an enterprise of this kind on a grand scale for fear of lawsuits.

Mr. SYMES. That is not the law of the arid regions. That position can not be maintained, admitting all the premises that the gentleman lays down, by the rulings of the courts throughout the arid regions.

Mr. HERBERT. That is the common law; that he who improperly retards the water that ought to flow down to his neighbor and for which his neighbor has use is subject to an action. That is the common law of this country, if it be not the law in Colorado. You may have statutes there which authorize your constituents to deprive Governor Thayer's people of this water.

Mr. SYMES. That is the common law in the humid but not in the arid region.

Mr. VANDEVER. The common law that the gentleman from Alabama alludes to is that which was intended to preserve the navigability of streams; and the question would be whether it should apply to streams of water used for navigation.

Mr. HERBERT. I am not stopping to answer nicely every legal question gentlemen may put to me; suffice it to say that if any private individual or corporation should undertake to do this thing the Government is expected to do he would himself be shingled all over with lawsuits. Now, sir, the gentleman from Colorado says very plainly that he does not want corporations or private individuals to get these sites. The amendment of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] provides that these reservoir sites shall be withdrawn from the market.

Mr. FELTON. In order that at a future time some way of disposing of them may be determined on, the same as they surveyed the public lands in order that they might determine in what way they would dispose of them.

Mr. HERBERT. Gentlemen know very well now that the two ways of disposing of these sites are either to let individuals undertake this work, or to enact that the Government shall do it. I hope gentlemen will allow me to go on with my argument.

The argument of the gentleman is that it is impracticable for any private individual to undertake this business, and the amendment which proposes to withdraw these lands simply means that the Government is to do it? If not, why will you not let an individual do it? Why shall the Government keep these reservoirs in its own possession? Can you tell me any reason except that the Government is to do this work? If individuals are to be allowed to do it at any time in the future, why will not gentlemen allow them to do it now?

Mr. FELTON. Does the gentleman want to be answered?

Mr. HERBERT. Answer in your own time.

Mr. SYMES. I should like to interrupt the gentleman there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. HERBERT. Let the gentleman ask me his question.

Mr. SYMES. Does the gentleman understand the object of this amendment to be to prevent private individuals and corporations from grabbing up these reservoirs to use plain western language, and reserve them for the Government and the people?

Mr. HERBERT. Exactly. That is the purpose of it. It is to keep private individuals from buying these sites, because if they get into possession the Government will have to buy them out. If you take the other course, if you allow whoever may wish to invest capital to build reservoirs and irrigate these lands, why, then, there can be no necessity for this amendment. Sir, the gentleman from Colorado can not deny that the scheme is that this work is to be done by the Government.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman pardon me? I do deny that we have any such scheme in view.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman says he has no such scheme in view. I should like to inquire what the amendment is for, and what does the gentleman mean by saying he wants to prevent corporations from grabbing up this land? To me, sir, it is clear that if this thing is ever to be done the Government must do it. The surveys that have already been made indicate clearly where these catchment basins are to be located. The geological survey has been going on for years, and a large portion of this arid region has been surveyed. I call attention to the testimony of Major Powell before the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate:

Q. Have you made this topographic survey in the line of what you call catchment districts?

A. Yes, sir. Wherever we have made the survey every catchment basin has been outlined on the map.

Q. That is to say you have in your surveys the necessary data for outlining those basins.

A. Yes, sir.

Now what use is there of the surveys that have been made except that the surveyor shall go there and stake the particular boundaries of these reservoirs as indicated by the map? If gentlemen will examine the map by Professor Hayden, standing there before them, they will find it is a contour map of the whole of Colorado and a large portion of New Mexico. On its every elevation of 200 feet is plainly marked down.

If you have the money you can tell your surveyor from that map where to go and locate your reservoir, just as did the projectors of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad. When I was investigating the Geological Survey the fact came out—I do not know whether it is in the testimony or not, but it was stated—that the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, which runs along through Marshall Pass, from Denver west, was absolutely located by the surveys made by the Government of the United States; that the projectors of that scheme had only to take the map and trace the line upon it as laid down by the United States surveyors and so locate the road. So with this map of Hayden.

There is no problem about this question except the money problem. Who is to take the responsibility? Who is to invest the money? That is all the problem there is to it. The gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER] was perfectly square when he said that private individuals would not do it; that is evident from the fact that these surveys have been made, many of them, as long as fifteen years ago, and the enterprise still waits on the Government. Now, if the Government is to undertake this scheme, what will it cost? But before I come to that, you are to tax the people of the wheat-growing region to bring into cultivation 96,000,000 acres of wheat land, which all the testimony concurs in saying will produce more wheat when irrigated than the rich prairies in the State of my friend from Illinois.

All the land in cultivation under wheat in this country is given in Mulhall's Progress of the World at less than 35,000,000 of acres; but let us assume that we have 40,000,000 acres of wheat lands in cultivation in the United States. If this scheme succeeds according to the dreams of its projectors, there will be brought into cultivation 96,000,000 acres of additional wheat lands. Allowing 16,000,000 of that for potatoes and other crops, although the land is said to be best adapted to wheat, there will be an addition of 80,000,000 acres of wheat land, twice the acreage now under cultivation, and capable of growing more than twice the wheat we now produce. What will be the result?

We export now annually about 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. The whole world takes only 290,000,000 bushels, and we supply more than half of it. If we bring into cultivation these additional 80,000,000 acres, our wheat product will be so enormously increased that we shall have to export three or four or five hundred million bushels. Where will we find a market for it? That is the question.

Mr. FELTON. You would not find it.

Mr. HERBERT. We would not find it. There would be so much more wheat grown that, unless we accepted the pauper prices which the paupers of Europe could pay, our wheat would be without a market.

Now, do the gentlemen who represent here the wheat-growing States of the West want to have their people taxed for the purpose of destroying the farmers who have sent them to this Congress? The same considerations apply to the South. It has been stated (although I think I shall show that the idea is chimerical) that the impounding of these waters in the Rocky Mountains would result in preventing overflows in the Mississippi Valley and redeeming to cultivation alluvial soil which would make 2,000,000 bales of cotton.

If that be true, do the farmers in Mississippi and all through the South desire to be taxed for an object of that kind? How much would the addition of 2,000,000 bales of cotton to the annual supply reduce the price of that article? Perhaps I am occupying a rather low plane when I look at the question in this light, but although I love my whole country and desire the welfare of it all I have never yet risen to that point of sublimated patriotism where I was able to forget the people who made me their representative.

Ought we to consent, so long as we claim equal and exact justice for all the people of this country, to tax the people of the East to this extent to redeem the arid regions of the West? Ordinary internal improvements of rivers and harbors are bad enough; but they are presumed to be for the benefit of commerce, and, to a large extent, to benefit all the people. But to tax the wheat-growers of the country to raise up rivals that will drive them out of the market, or the cotton-growers of the South to redeem from overflow lands of other persons—lands that if put into cultivation would produce so much as to press down still further the price of cotton. Sir, I would not do that if I knew the scheme would succeed. I certainly can not do it when I know it is chimerical. That is, Mr. Speaker, the scheme is absolutely chimerical so far as the prevention of overflow in the Mississippi River is concerned. In the first place, there are in the whole United States 3,547,000 square miles of land; and of that number about 2,450,000 square miles—more than two-thirds—are drained into the Mississippi River. Look at that map down in the left-hand corner, on the right. The green ridge on the right represents the Alleghany Mountains; on the left are represented the Rocky Mountains. All that intervening space is the watershed of the Mississippi River. Into that flow the great rivers I shall name. First, the Upper Mississippi, the mean discharge of which per second is 105,000 cubic feet; the Missouri, with a mean discharge of 120,000 cubic feet; the Ohio, 138,000; the Arkansas, 63,000; the Red River, 57,000; the Yazoo, 43,000; the St. Francis, 61,000; and into the Lower Mississippi altogether there is a mean discharge of 675,000 cubic feet, making, as I have said, 2,450,000 square miles drained into that river. The Missouri River is only the second; and it heads in the Rocky Mountains, many hundred miles back, as the Arkansas River does. How much of that area is drained through the Missouri River and the Arkansas River into the Mississippi? Major Powell in his testimony says that these reservoirs are to be put high up on the mountains. Let me read what he says, so that there may be no mistake about it:

In the valleys of Nevada there are from 60 to 80 inches of evaporation from a body of water. If you go up into the high country the evaporation may be but 11 or 12 to 15 inches. To store water where the evaporation is 50 or 60 inches is to store it to be evaporated to the heavens. These reservoirs are to be constructed in the highlands, where the country is moist.

Again he says:

So the water must be stored in the mountains, for economy, where it falls, for if it runs down across the plains it is wasted in the sands.

Again:

Nine-tenths of the reservoirs will be made in regions of country where agriculture is impossible, but 10, 20, 30, or 50 miles below the water will be conducted by canals.

It is only the water that falls upon the Rocky Mountains that is to be impounded in reservoirs and thus kept out of the Mississippi. Look at the map there. See that little spot of blue just west of the deep green, and compare its dimensions with the size of all that region. It is absolutely infinitesimal. I should not think it would make the two hundredth part of the area drained into the Mississippi Valley. Yet it is only there that Major Powell proposes to impound this water; and only half of the water and snow falling upon the mountains is to be imprisoned and kept out of the Mississippi; the other half flows west. What effect would that have upon the valley of the great Mississippi River? Look at the question for yourselves and think about it. Examine that map, taking into consideration the fact, as the maps which I have here show, that after you get west of about the one hundredth meridian the rainfall gets less and less until it is between 18 and 20 inches per annum. Major Powell states that in some of the mountains there is a rainfall of 70 inches. I am told at the Signal Office such is the fact; but that is only one comparatively small spot away west of the Rocky Mountains somewhere in the Sierras; and that rainfall runs off toward the Pacific Ocean. That is what our friend from California wants to scoop up.

But we are now discussing the problem of how much of the Rocky Mountain rainfall goes into the Mississippi Valley and subsequently——

Mr. CATCHINGS. What is the water discharge of the Missouri River?

Mr. HERBERT. One hundred and twenty thousand cubic feet per second; of the Mississippi River it is 675,000.

The gentleman's inquiry calls my attention to another argument of Professor Powell, which is that the Missouri River carries 86 per cent. of the sediment that gets into the Mississippi River. Where does that come from?

Mr. CATCHINGS. When the gentleman speaks of the discharge of the Mississippi River he refers to the low-water discharge?

Mr. HERBERT. No, to the mean discharge.

Mr. CATCHINGS. As I understand, the mean discharge of the Mississippi River at Cairo is 1,250,000 cubic feet per second.

Mr. HERBERT. The authority to which I refer is a book on the Valley of the Mississippi, by Foster, which gives the mean discharge of the Lower Mississippi at 675,000 cubic feet and of the Missouri at 120,000. Here it is.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman allow me a remark right here? He is discussing, as I understand, the question whether the floods in the Lower Mississippi are not occasioned by the melting of snow in the mountains. Is not that in fact the cause?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir. I am glad to answer the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN. Will my friend from Alabama allow me to answer that question?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; I have the answers here, obtained from the Signal Office.

Mr. DUNN. I can state some facts which will put the matter at rest.

Mr. HERBERT. I have the answers here, for I expected some one would raise that question. Before going into that, however, I must finish the topic I was discussing. As I was asking, where does this sediment which goes into the Mississippi River come from? Here is a report by a major of engineers who examined that question, extending his investigations over a distance of 720 miles—up to Sioux City; and he says it comes from the caving in of the banks along that part of the river.

Bank erosion to the extent of 2,000 feet per annum, over long distances, has been noted, and to a greater or less extent it is constantly going on, even during low stages. The enormous amount of material thus precipitated into the river, together with that scoured from the bed, causes the formation of innumerable bars which even at high water obstruct navigation.

At another place he says:

This is explained by the fact that the largest portion of the suspended sediment is undoubtedly due to the caving of the banks, in which progress a much larger amount of material is thrown into the stream than due to actual erosion. By this latter action the toe of the bank is undermined, and the upper portion, being unsupported, falls in, when the lighter materials of which it is composed are carried off by the water in a state of suspension, the heavier materials remaining on the bottom.

Now, sir, your question was about how much of that water from the Rocky Mountains comes into the Mississippi. I asked that question of the Signal Service Bureau. Here is the answer of the acting chief of the bureau, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Probable effect of the rainfall in the Rocky Mountain region on the floods in the Mississippi may be approximately stated as follows:

The rainfall in New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana, for the year, is not more than one-fortieth of the rainfall which occurs in the watersheds of the Mississippi, and of the annual rainfall one-half of it occurs during those months of the year when it would not be possible for the waters in the Rocky Mountain region to reach the Mississippi River during the flood season. According to this estimate not more than one-eightieth of the precipitation which goes to make up the floods of the Mississippi can possibly come from the Rocky Mountain region, and of this one-eightieth it is probable that one-half of it disappears by evaporation, as the average relative humidity of that region is very low, and the annual evaporation amounts, approximately, to 50 inches per year.

From the above it will be seen that not one one-hundredth part of the water causing the Mississippi floods is due to the precipitation occurring in the Rocky Mountain region, and if reservoirs were constructed which would retain the entire precipitation in that region, the floods in the Lower Mississippi would not be reduced below the danger line.

Mr. HERBERT. There is the statement of the Chief of the Signal Office that not one-hundredth part of the water in the Mississippi River can come from the Rocky Mountains. If that be so what is the effect upon the floods in that great river? What would be the effect of putting these reservoirs high up on the mountains, as is proposed by the bill?

Mr. DUNN. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Alabama at this point to show what effect they do have on the Mississippi River. I am satisfied there is an overestimate in the minds of gentlemen as to the influence of the waters of the Missouri River in the overflows of the Mississippi. Those who are familiar with the floods of the Mississippi River know the great winter and spring floods come from the Ohio River and its tributaries and from the Mississippi. The only effect the Missouri River has ever had on the floods or the overflows of the Mississippi River has occurred once in fourteen years as an average during the last sixty years. Whenever the melting of the snows on the Rocky Mountains brings along a flood of the Missouri River into the Mississippi and it catches the Mississippi full up to its banks, then it precipitates what is called the summer overflow, and the only effect of damming up the waters of the Missouri or the waters of the Mississippi will be to that extent to restrain those fifteen-year overflows, which are disastrous in their effect.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether to prevent the summer overflow of the Mississippi River referred to by him we would not have to retain the whole of the water that comes down in those mountains?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. I think the gentleman has been too liberal to the other side.

Mr. DUNN. I do not wish any one to misunderstand as to the overflows of the Missouri River.

Mr. HERBERT. It seems to me the gentleman has gone too far and admitted too much.

Mr. DUNN. I have stated the fact.

Mr. HERBERT. Do not interrupt me any more as I have little time.

Mr. DUNN. I have stated the fact without regard to direction.

Mr. HERBERT. To ascertain how much effect on the Missouri River and on the summer overflows of the Mississippi the melting of the Rocky Mountain snows did have I addressed the question to the Signal Service and here is the answer which I received.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIGNAL OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, September 8, 1888.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request of the 7th instant, the Acting Chief Signal Officer has the honor to inclose herewith a "table showing highest water in the Mississippi, Arkansas, and Ohio Rivers, with departure from danger-line during the months of June and July, 1878 to 1887, inclusive."

Of the ten years for which the record is given, five years were without dangerous floods in the Lower Mississippi Valley, and of the floods that did occur none were excessively dangerous, and the high water in each case was directly traceable to the heavy rains which occurred in the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys and not the Missouri Valley. The accompanying charts, showing precipitation for the months and years named, clearly indicate the origin of these floods.

Following is a comparative statement of high water and precipitation during the year in which floods occured:

In 1881, at New Orleans, in June, river 0.9 feet above danger-line.

The precipitation was from 8 to 20 inches in the Lower Red River valley during May. The Mississippi was not above danger-line above New Orleans. (See Chart A herewith.)

In 1882, at Helena, in June, river 3.4 feet above danger-line; Vicksburg, in June, 0.5 feet above danger-line; New Orleans, in June, 0.4 feet above danger-line; Helena, in July, 1.9 feet above danger line; New Orleans, in July, 0.4 feet above danger-line.

The precipitation was from 8 to 15 inches in the Ohio and upper portion of the Lower Mississippi Valleys during May; over 8 inches in portions of the Ohio and Upper Mississippi Valleys during June, and from 8 to 14 inches in the Lower Mississippi and Red River Valleys during July. (See Charts B, C, and D.)

In 1883 at New Orleans, in June, river 1.7 feet above danger-line; at New Orleans, in July, river 0.6 feet above danger-line.

The precipitation was over 8 inches in the lower portion of the Lower Mississippi Valley in June, and in portions of the Arkansas Valley in July. The river was not above danger-line above New Orleans. (See Charts E and F.)

In 1884, at Vicksburg, in June, river 0.3 foot above danger line. At New Orleans, in June, river 1.4 feet above danger line. The precipitation was from 8 to 15 inches in the valleys of the Lower Red River and Lower Mississippi during May, and over 8 inches in the lower portion of the Lower Mississippi Valley during June. (See Charts G and H.)

In 1886, at New Orleans, in June, river 1.4 feet above danger line. The precipitation was from 8 to 10 inches in the Lower Mississippi Valley during June. (See Chart K.)

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. H. DANWOODY,
First Lieutenant Fourth Artillery,
Acting Chief Signal Officer.

Hon. HILARY A. HERBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HERBERT. The answer is this, that the floods that have occurred within the last ten years in June and July in that river have not come down from the Missouri River at all. Here are the charts showing the rainfall by months, the charts referred to in that letter. The limits of the rainfall are clearly marked on the map, and it will be seen that these maps date back for years. You can see in these charts for each month exactly where the great body of the rainfall was. In the chart which I hold in my hand you will observe it is marked here in the western portion of the Mississippi Valley. In others it varies materially. Here it is on the Ohio River and in that region; here again it extends to near the one hundredth meridian, including part of Nebraska but not extending to the western part of it.

Here, again, the heaviest rainfall is shown down upon the Lower Mississippi, and so on throughout all of this series of charts, which I would like gentlemen to examine for themselves. There is nothing whatever therefore in the assertion that the impounding of the waters in the Rocky Mountains would prevent an overflow of the Mississippi River. Much can be done, I admit, by the Government for irrigation if it will invest millions and millions of dollars in impounding the waters in the Rocky Mountains. As Major Powell says, by digging canals and irrigating ditches for 20, 30, 40, and 50 miles you can use the water thus impounded to fertilize the lands. Lands of whom? Somebody said here the other day that this bill was to "restrain corporate greed." Let us see about that.

Why, the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Northern Pacific have great areas of land all through the arid regions, and I suppose they have now, although they have sold a great deal to private individuals, at least 125,000,000 acres of land, and upon those lands, if this amendment succeeds, reservoirs are to be located by Government surveyors free of cost to those great corporations. That is the way you are to "restrain corporate greed."

Mr. SYMES. Pardon me there——

Mr. HERBERT. I beg to be excused. I can not yield further.

Gentlemen who have taken the trouble to investigate this matter will see that this grand scheme is only practicable if the Government undertakes it. You must get the Government back of it in order to make it a success; and after you once get the Government to undertake it, it can never stop. We must go on and on indefinitely.

Where is to be the limit? You can not consistently use the waters of that region to fertilize the lands of the constituents of the gentleman from Colorado without doing the same thing for the people of Nebraska, California, and New Mexico, and all through the arid regions; and in doing all this we are taxing the people of the East, we are taxing the people of the South to do what there is certainly no present necessity for. Mr. Speaker, the very moment that we undertake to say that no private individual shall enter any of these lands or obtain a title to them, that very moment we shut out all prospect of having such work done by private enterprise. By withdrawing the lands from the market we say no private individual shall do this work. When we say that, we commit the Government to the project. If we will not allow private enterprise to undertake it, then we must in good faith to the people of that region do it ourselves, and do it regardless of cost. How much will it cost? Have gentlemen given this matter a thought?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for five minutes, as I was interrupted a great deal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] said that there were many acres in Colorado which had been irrigated at an expenditure of not exceeding $2.50 an acre. I have no doubt of it. When that great fertile valley of the Platte lay there, in its virgin state, it probably in many cases did not cost a dollar an acre to irrigate it. But it is being day by day and year by year made more difficult, until now all of the lands that can be easily irrigated by private enterprise or by individuals have been taken up. The work becomes more and more expensive as accessible water is exhausted, and now they ask the Government to step in and do it. Now, every acre of land that is irrigated, every acre of fertile land, is worth, and I think the gentleman from Colorado will agree with me, at least $30 an acre. The gentleman nods approvingly.

Mr. SYMES. It is worth about that and from that up to $100 an acre.

Mr. HERBERT. Very well; then does anybody believe that there is any land in Colorado or in that arid region that could be made worth from $30 to $100 an acre at an expenditure of say $15 an acre where capital could not be found prompt to enter upon the work? You can get the land for almost nothing from the Government, and if you can fertilize it at $15 an acre, and make it worth $30 to $100, is it not reasonable to suppose that private enterprise would enter upon the work? There are throughout the West any quantity of millionaires, in Colorado, in Nevada, in California, all through the Western States, millions of capital waiting investment, and if this work could be done, and such an enormous profit realized upon the investment, it is only reasonable to conclude that the Government would not be called upon.

But as it is, the Government is expected to pay the cost, because it does not promise to be a profitable investment. It is absolutely certain to cost more than $10 an acre. It will cost more than $12.50 an acre. If it costs that, how much would the aggregate expenditure be to reclaim the 96,000,000 acres said to be reclaimable? It will amount to more than our present national debt. That is to-day a billion of dollars. That is the scheme we are asked to embark upon. I appeal to gentlemen representing Western constituencies that grow wheat and Southern constituencies who grow cotton, and constituencies all over the country who pay the taxes, are you willing to embark the Government now upon this scheme, a scheme involving more in the end than $1,000,000,000? Are you ready to do so? That is the question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the erection thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. H. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Eliza V. de Kilpatrick, widow of General Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 10856) for pension for Eliza N. Aiken.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAISH. I desire to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair). If there be no objection the Chair will entertain the report of the conferees upon the Army bill.

Mr. SYMES. I would like to know how long it will take.

Mr. MAISH. It will not take over three minutes.

Mr. SYMES. If the gentleman will guaranty it will not take long, I shall not object. However, I leave it to the judgment of the gentleman in charge of this matter.

Mr. FORNEY. I have no objection.

Mr. MAISH. It is a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 32, 33, and 35 to the bill (H. R. 10234) "making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 33.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraph, being lines 3 to 8, both inclusive, on page 16 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matters proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"(35) SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the 225 acres of land on the Hudson River, directly south of the military reservation at West Point, belonging to the estate of Edward V. Kinsley, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary for the purposes of the Military Academy, and to receive offers for the sale of their interest in such land from such of the heirs of said Kinsley as are competent and willing to sell such interests; and the Secretary of War is authorized to submit all offers so made and the question of the value of said 225 acres to a board to consist of the Superintendent of the Military Academy and two competent civilians, who shall make due investigation and report concerning said value; and the Secretary of War shall submit said offers and the report of said board, with his opinion, to Congress at its next session. The expenses of said board and compensation at the rate of $10 a day for not more than ten days for each of the civilian members shall be paid from the appropriation for contingencies of the Army."

And the Senate agree to the same.

LEVI MAISH,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 32, 33, and 35, to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended on the Senate amendments to said bill:

On amendment numbered 32 strike out the following provision from the bill, namely:

"For examining, testing, and experimenting with pneumatic or other dynamite guns, gun carriages, and plants for the same, and dynamite shells and ammunition, and batteries for coast defense, whether sunken, counterpoise, or otherwise, brought to the notice of the Secretary of War, $100,000, or so much thereof as he may deem proper."

On amendment numbered 33: Strikes out Senate provision for the manufacture, or purchase, and test of cannon and carriages; for the alteration of carriages on hand; for projectiles, powders, fuses, and implements, their trial and proof, and for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines, and appropriating therefor the sum of $600,000.

On amendment numbered 35: Authorizes the Secretray of War to enter into negotiations for the purchase of certain land adjoining the military reservation at West Point, and to submit all offers made and the question of the value of the land to a board to consist of the Superintendent of the Military Academy and two competent civilians, and requires the Secretary to transmit to Congress at its next session the report of said board with his opinion. Strikes out sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of said amendments providing for the establishment of an army gun factory at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., and appropriating therefor the sum of $750, 000; for the purchase of steel for high-power coast-defense guns, and appropriating therefor the sum of $5,000,000; for the purchase of submarine mines, casemates, cable galleries, and continuing torpedo experiments, and appropriating therefor the sum of $500,000, and for the purchase of submarine controllable torpedoes or torpedoes and torpedo-boats controllable from those and adapted to coast defense and appropriating therefor the sum of $100,000.

The amount of the bill as agreed to is $24,471,300, a reduction from the amount of the bill as passed the House of $168,000.

LEVI MAISH.
JOSEPH D. SAYERS.
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. MAISH. I desire to say that the amount appropriated by the bill as passed by the House was $24,639,300. The amount as passed by the Senate was $31,531,800, and the bill as now reported appropriates $24,471,300.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. MAISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SYMES. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. FORNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if we can not agree on some hour at which the debate shall be closed?

Mr. SYMES. I think I can get along with an hour on our side.

Mr. FORNEY. Can not you make it three-quarters of an hour?

Mr. SYMES. I feel somewhat embarrassed about this matter, because I have granted time to gentlemen who desire to speak on this subject, sufficient to occupy the hour. Here are the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE], who desire to speak on this question, who are representatives of the two greatest Territories in the Union, and no time has been reserved for them. I do not feel justified in lessening the time for debate after making the promises of time I have made.

Mr. FORNEY. Will you agree to one hour on your side and one on our side? We need not occupy it unless we choose to. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that side have one hour and this side one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I object, unless I can make arrangement to have time in which to speak.

Mr. PETERS. I shall ask an opportunity to speak on this question, and want about five or seven minutes. I do not desire to occupy much time, but I desire to be heard.

Mr. FORNEY. I am willing to give that out of our hour.

Mr. PETERS. As I understand, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] desire to speak. Will the gentleman give them five minutes?

Mr. SYMES. This is a very important matter, and the objection of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] will make it imperative that I shall not agree to the time being limited as suggested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection would have to come from a member of the House.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] have no time parceled out to them, and that they may have an opportunity to speak, I shall object.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the session be extended to 6 o'clock.

Mr. SYMES. I will not object to that, provided it be understood that we take the vote to-morrow morning. There are a number of gentlemen who say they can not remain in the Hall until 6 o'clock, but who desire to vote to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Alabama to ask unanimous consent that the session be extended to 6 o'clock, the time to be divided equally between the friends of this proposition and those opposed to it, the debate on the proposition and the pending amendment thereto to be considered as closed and that the vote be taken to-morrow morning?

Mr. VANDEVER. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I do not see any necessity for extending the session beyond 5 o'clock. I think the rule was passed for the purpose of avoiding late sessions, because we have already had sufficient tax upon our strength and attention. I think to-morrow morning we will have a fuller House and dispose of it probably in half an hour. I hope gentlemen will agree to such debate as they see fit, and that when they have concluded the debate, at the time the vote is taken, we shall have a fuller House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. FORNEY. Let us agree on four hours of debate, two hours on each side.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Who is to control the time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama on the right [Mr. FORNEY] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] on the left will be permitted to control the time in the absence of any other arrangement by the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SYMES. I now yield twelve minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune some years ago to traverse the section of country involved in this appropriation, and I may say in passing, in some countries the members of their national councils are encouraged to travel over the country that they may intelligently legislate for the people, and in the direction of an increase of intelligence to Congress I sometimes think the provisions of the interstate-commerce law, which prohibited railroads from extending courtesies, should have been reversed in the case of Congressmen, and that members should be compelled to use them. [Laughter.]

It would change marvelously not only the judgment of members, but their speeches. If gentlemen had personally visited the region in question here, there are very few who would require any appeals to induce them to vote for the pending proposition. I listened with a great deal of pleasure awhile ago to the reading of the conference report on the fortifications bill, a bill which, I think, appropriates $24,000,000, and I have ardently supported all of the measures reported by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HERBERT], who has just spoken, having the same general object in view, namely, to provide this country with a magnificent system of defense and of offense if necessary.

But, while we are doing that, would it not be a good idea to cultivate also, to some slight extent at least, the art of peace? When we realize that to-day there are thousands of people in our large cities who are of very little benefit to themselves or to the community for want of employment, but who if they could go upon the land would become producers of wealth both to themselves and the country, we must be impressed with the importance of extending the area of our cultivable lands as much as possible. The territory involved in the arid region, so called, will become, with irrigation, the garden of America. There is no other land within our limits which is so abundantly productive as that can be made with the aid of water.

I remember stopping at Humboldt, a veritable oasis in the desert, which had been reclaimed by irrigation within ten years, and I saw there trees from 15 to 20 feet in height, the most luxurious grasses, the most delicious fruits, and every evidence of the highest cultivation. And yet that spot is surrounded by what is almost literally a desert. And as you travel through those sandy plains you see many such places where they have brought water from the hills and have converted the barren plains into smiling and beautiful garden spots.

As an instance of the injury to a section by private parties controlling the land, take the Utah valley. There you find a splendid stream, the Humboldt River, which disappears in a subterranean channel and is lost, when below it there are thousands and thousands of acres, upon which, with the aid of irrigation, the people of this country could build up happy and prosperous homes. But you have permitted the control of the land to pass into private hands, and the parties who have taken it for speculative purposes are perfectly willing to wait for ten, twenty, or thirty years; and if you wait until all the natural sites for these reservoirs are controlled by private individuals, you will have permitted a serious obstruction to the reclaiming and improvement of that portion of our country.

Gentlemen talk about this enormous expenditure; but it seems to me that when you haggle about a small appropriation like this—for it is small when you remember that the object is to reclaim an empire—and at the same time we rush through a fortification bill appropriating $24,000,000, there is a slight inconsistency from a broad-gauge standpoint. [Applause.] Now, I appreciate the objections raised by gentlemen who are not familiar with the country, and who do not comprehend the immense advantages which would ensue.

They say that if we begin this enterprise it will result in the expenditure of millions. I hope it will, sir; and I hope that in a few years the men elected by the people will be so educated upon this subject that they will cheerfully and gladly vote all the money that is required. The argument which is behind the Oklahoma bill, and which has influenced the labor organizations of this country to appeal to us in its favor by petitions bearing thousands and thousands of signatures, applies with equal force to this bill.

They have sent up those petitions because they believe it is for the benefit of the working classes to enlarge as far as we possibly can the opportunities for the workingmen of the country to find homes upon the public domain. The displacement of human labor by labor-saving machinery, which is going on steadily all the time at such a marvelous rate, naturally raises the question in the mind of every workingman as to what is to be the ultimate result of the movement, and what is to be its effect upon himself and upon his children, for they believe amid the varying changes and uncertainties of life they all see that there is at least one refuge from want. They know that by their own toil and their own industry they can obtain a competence from the soil, and can bring up their families to be good and noble citizens of the great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. SYMES. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no scientific knowledge upon this subject. I have never studied it from a scientific standpoint. I have never had time to do so. The many duties that have devolved upon me since I have been a member of this House have prevented me from giving the subject that careful attention and acquiring that accurate knowledge which a man should possess before undertaking to discuss it from a scientific point of view. All the knowledge I have upon this question is that which came to me from actual experience and observation.

But I have sometimes thought that kind of knowledge is much preferable to theoretical knowledge, which is often misleading and is not so easily understood by the masses of the people. I know from my own experience, as well as from observation, the effect of bodies of water upon the rainfall of certain sections of the country. I do not know whether it can be explained upon scientific grounds; I have not taken the trouble to ascertain. But I do know as a fact that wherever there is a body of water, even though it may be at such an altitude as to be near the line of vegetation, the presence of that body has an effect upon the rainfall. I know that in the history of my own State, in the very county in which I now live—which, by the way, is in the midst of the agricultural belt—as late as 1872 we had almost no rainfall, and it was not believed that county could ever be an agricultural county, not for want of soil, but for want of rainfall.

Yet, although such was the case in 1872, that is to-day, as I have said, one of the finest agricultural counties in the State, and is in what is known as the agricultural belt.

What brought this about? There are no large bodies of water to the west of this; and most of our rains in that section come from the west and the northwest. The Arkansas River traverses this country, of course; but there are no lakes, no reservoirs from which water can be drawn up into the air, formed into clouds, and then returned to the earth. The only way in which I can account for the change in the rainfall, or, as we say there, the moving westward of the rain-belt, is in the fact of cultivation, the railroad, the telegraph, the artificial timber which has been planted, and a large number of other causes which have had an influence upon the climate in making everything more porous so as to retain the moisture; and as this moisture has been absorbed by the soil, as all these influences have had their effect upon the climate, the rainfall has gradually and continually increased.

Thus from the year 1872 up to the present time that rain-belt, by this gradual extension of civilization, has gone westward from where I live more than 130 miles; and a very large section of country which, even as late as 1878, was nothing but a large cattle domain, fit only for pasturage because there was no rainfall during the crop season, is now so changed that it can be placed in crops to advantage, the rainfall being distributed through the crop season. If the experience and observation of men who have lived in the Western country can be taken for anything, this result has been brought about by the gradual extension of civilization into that country, and by the breaking up of the soil.

Now, arguing from that position, I believe that if a reservoir were established, for instance, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains in the State of Colorado—a reservoir which would furnish to the clouds the material from which they could be supplied so as to cause a precipitation of the rainfall—by such a system of reservoirs, the rain-belt could be extended to the very foot of the Rocky Mountain range; and if so, it would bring under cultivation an empire even in Western Kansas and Colorado alone.

I do not know anything of what happens west of the Rocky Mountain range, as I have never had the pleasure of going there. My duties have always confined me to the eastern side of those mountains. But I do know that the very presence of those irrigation-ditches in my district has had a wonderful effect upon the rainfall in that section. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] said there was not a single instance within his memory throughout the country where the irrigation process has been made successful. I will state to him that there is in my district alone one irrigation-ditch more than 75 miles long which has been built by private enterprise. According to the observation of those competent to testify, that ditch has not only been a benefit to the land immediately irrigated by it, but has had a very valuable effect even upon portions of country not near enough to be so irrigated. Why? Because that irrigating ditch—a body of water 30 feet wide and about 4 feet deep—furnishes something from which the sun can draw up into the air that which makes clouds, and which, by climatic conditions, will be returned in the shape of rain.

I believe from this evidence that the presence of reservoirs in that Western country would gradually increase the amount of moisture from which the clouds could be formed.

There is another matter to be considered in this connection. The Arkansas River through a great portion of my district has been, during the last summer, dry—why? Because much of the water has been taken out, away up in the western part of Kansas, by these irrigating ditches, so that a large part of the bottom of the Arkansas River for as much as 20 or 30 miles in my district, has been dry. There is a reason for this, and the reason is plain. The water has been taken out of the river by these irrigating ditches. Then we want something to supply more water to that river.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] does not agree with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], who said that the cause of which the gentleman speaks did not dry up the stream below.

Mr. SYMES. No; I did not say that it might not take up the water and dry up the streams immediately below.

Mr. HERBERT. I understand that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] directly contradict each other.

Mr. SYMES. Oh, no.

Mr. PETERS. I will leave that to be settled between the two gentlemen.

Mr. SYMES. I said that the water found its way back to the stream below by percolation.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Kansas is taking Governor Thayer's side.

Mr. PETERS. I do not know whose side I am taking except my own.

Mr. HERBERT (to Mr. PETERS). I think you are right; the stream is dried up in the way you state.

Mr. PETERS. So far as this irrigation question is concerned, by reducing the water in the Arkansas River it reduces the water from which there is a very large sub-irrigation, and that makes the Arkansas valley productive from one side to the other. This system of reservoirs proposed by this appropriation would husband the supply, so that it could be made available during the cropping season, and by this means retain a continued flow of water in the bed of the river at all times.

This subirrigation which goes out from the Arkansas underground, extending throughout the valley, which is in some places 4 to 5 miles wide, has been one of the means of the fertility of that noted section. Experience and observation in the valley have been that whenever a tree which is planted has been able to push its roots down far enough to reach this subirrigation, which is 5 or 6 feet below the surface, the result has been marvelous. It may be that the growth of timber referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] took its rise from this source. The presence of these reservoirs, increasing, as I think they will, the rainfall in the upper valley, will help continue the current in the river and thus preserve this valuable subirrigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. I will now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the object of the Senate amendment it is to add to the geological and perhaps topographical survey a hydrographic survey, so to speak; it may not be strictly so, but of that nature. I take it the object of these surveys is the same as that which has always been considered as the object of the surveys which have already been made, and that is to get information in regard to the conditions in which the public lands are surrounded and are situated geologically and topographically, to which it is now proposed to add this hydrographic feature in order to obtain a knowledge for the proper disposition of the same. If it is necessary for the wise and proper distribution of our public domain that the hydrographic character of the same should be known, then it strikes me it ought to be done now rather than to defer it to a future time from the fact that it can be earlier, cheaper, and more easily accomplished at this time than to defer it; and I take this to be the object of the Senate amendment.

It is said by some gentlemen opposed to its passage that its passage at this time would entail for the future an enormous and endless amount of expenditure which the Government will surely be called upon to pay. I do not so understand it, nor do I understand gentlemen in favor of the amendment to so understand it or desire this to be its consummation. The object is simply to ascertain certain facts and to sequester from public sale certain locations well calculated for reservoir purposes for the purpose of impounding the surplus waters which rise at a given time, and thus prevent their departure to the sea in such quantities as to be an evil instead of a blessing in destroying not only the water ways but much of the adjacent lands through which they pass. The object is simply to ascertain certain facts in connection therewith and to withdraw from public sale certain lands within certain localities well calculated by nature for the creation of reservoirs in which to impound the surplus water of certain seasons of the year.

That the Government may need this information for the wise disposition of this class of land in order that those, in the common parlance of this House, who are termed land-grabbers shall not further do as they are now doing and have been doing in the past, take up large tracts of this character of land for the purpose of holding the same, in the belief and almost certainty that it is only a question of time when they will be necessary for the irrigation of the surrounding country, and hence become very valuable; in short, to sit down upon and hold them at a Government price for from five, ten, fifteen, and to perhaps twenty years, when they shall become an absolute necessity to the settlers and inhabitants who have settled or desire to settle and make homes upon the lands adjacent thereto (we in California have had much experience in this matter), when they can exact terms of the inhabitants either for the sale of the said locality or for the price of the waters they may have impounded for the purpose of irrigation. In fact, exacting whatever price they choose for either.

If the Government would now set aside these lands, holding them in reserve whenever the time comes when it is necessary for its disposition, it may in its wisdom and in the light of subsequent events make such disposition of them as may be necessary and wise for the welfare of all concerned and the country generally.

And now I desire to say I do not believe it would be wise or good policy on the part of this Government, situated as we are, to engage in a general expenditure for the development of this or any other system of irrigation or improvement of like character for reasons too obvious to need mention, and I furthermore agree with the gentleman opposed to this amendment (or on the other side of this question), in that I would not vote or have the Government engage in any business whatsoever that the individual or a combination of them can do and ought to do.

If it requires an aggregation of capital even known as a corporation, this Government and those of the respective States which comprise it, if they have the wisdom they have the constitutional power to protect themselves from the extortion from any association of men, or capital, or combination created by their own laws. If they have the wisdom and the integrity, the power is within their own hands, and in the disposition of these lands this Government has the power to couple with their disposition such restrictions as will be just to the association or corporation that may engage in their development and for the benefit of the masses of the people who are and may become interested.

Now, sir, my main object in securing time to speak upon this question was to submit my views in regard to the amendment, which I had the honor to offer for the preservation of the watersheds from being denuded from their timber and underbrush, which would furnish the supply for the filling of the natural streams and the artificial reservoirs designated by this amendment.

The theory is that the source of water is the heavens, that its quality depends upon the composition of the soil upon which it falls and percolates through; that its preservation in quantity depends upon the watershed upon which it falls, as preventing its rapid exit to the stream thence to the ocean or its evaporation; that its preservation is essential to the fertility of the soil, as well as for the prevention of floods which annually destroy not only a large area of the most arable lands but at times causes the destruction of vast amounts of property and the lives upon them; and I believe the first and most important part of this question is to preserve the natural watersheds of the country and then of the reservoir sights for the impounding of their surplus, or both at once, which it is proposed to do by this amendment and the amendment to it.

Any observing person who has traveled through the West, over the Sierra Nevada Mountains and its parallel spurs and ranges when they were in a comparative state of nature, undisturbed by the vandal's hand, could not have failed to observe on their ridges at altitudes from 3,500 to 4,500, and 6,000 feet in height the winter snows remaining unmelted until late in the fall, and in many places not then, their existence, so far as we know, being perpetual; and one who has visited them since, where for miles and tens of miles the timber had been cut and the surface denuded of its young growth and underbrush, would observe in the spring and by the early summer no vestige of this store-house of nature's for the preservation of the waters. A warm rain, a few bright days of sunshine, and then the deluge, creating loss and devastation in its train and robbing the future of what nature had intended and arranged for the benefit and prosperity of mankind. I regard it, sir, as very important if the House should not conclude to pass the Senate amendment that it should pass this amendment to it, as it will involve but a small expense; that some instructions should be given to the survey or a law passed by which certain lands on these ridges and mountains should be designated and set apart as watersheds in order that the growth of timber and underbrush should be preserved. I would if I had the power reserve from sale every mountain ridge and every acre of timber land upon them and every acre of underbrush upon the Sierra Nevada Mountains, or any of its parallel or contiguous ranges above an altitude of 3,500 feet.

It would be wisdom to adopt such a policy in a country where the seasons are as uniform as they are in that part of the country where the rains are periodical and not general; it is indispensable, or will become so, for the preservation of the agricultural interests of its lower altitudes and valleys. As to what could be accomplished in this direction by proper care of these vast watersheds, the people interested in that region are fully conversant and alive to its importance. They know what can be done; they have proved it by experience; they have discovered the effect of the denuding of these sections of nature's growth for the preservation of the country, and by the purchase of lands and the allowing of nature to reassert herself and restore them to their former primitive condition. They have found the streams increasing in their volume of water month by month and year by year; they have observed the streams that were dry in the early summer continuing in volume until the fall and winter rains.

Something has been said during the course of the debate upon this measure in regard to the rainfall in different sections of the country. That there is a great difference there is no question; but my experience has taught me that it is very difficult to obtain correct facts, as the rainfall varies, as do the localities in which it falls. I know of localities, situated between two ranges of mountains, where upon the western range the average rainfall is 30 inches per annum, upon the eastern range it is 40, and in the valley it is only from 14 to 20. In parts of the Sierra Nevada Mountains it is from 40 to 60 and 80 inches; where at some seasons the snowfall is from 15 to 20 feet deep, and in other portions it is not over one-third of that amount, a difference of 10 or 20 miles in breadth showing entirely different results.

As the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] has well said that the cultivation and irrigation of the soil has in his part of the country extended what is termed the rain-belt a hundred miles westward, in a country once deemed unfit for cultivation, but which now is among the most desirable portions of the country for agriculture, what was only once fit for grazing are the homes of agriculturists.

It is supposed that the rainfalls are caused and determined by the configuration of the country and the prevailing currents of the atmosphere. By irrigation waters are stored within the soil as reservoirs and covered by the same, and thus a new and local source of water supply for evaporation and condensation is created, new currents evolved; a rainfall, a change of atmosphere, and absolute new condition and climate in that locality is the result. There is no question of it; we have abundant examples of it in the West. Let us, then, preserve from sale the reservoir sites, the watersheds to fill them, and at a proper time and in a wise way dispose of them.

Now, to refer a moment to this amendment. If the House should deem it wise to pass the amendment, which I understand and believe goes no further than the setting aside of the reservoir sites, there is nothing within the law, as I see it, that requires the Government to increase the appropriations, and in my opinion the development never will be done by the Government; but, as was said by gentlemen on the other side of the House, so soon as it is necessary there is plenty of capital to take care of this enterprise; to engage in it if it is possible to make it profitable; and by the aggregation of individuals it can be done, and it can be given to them under such conditions that, whilst it would make it profitable to them, it will not make the parties so interested the lords of the manor, the soil, and the water. The Government could make conditions that would be and prove alike fair and just to all.

Mr. SYMES. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona Mr. Speaker, in the very beginning of this session I introduced a bill having for its object the reclamation of the desert land in Arizona and making an appropriation for a hydrographic survey of that Territory. The Committee on Territories, to whom it was referred, promptly reported the bill with certain amendments unanimously and recommended its passage. The long tariff debate and the inexorable appropriation bills and other pressing business of great magnitude have conspired to keep that measure silent on the Calendar of the House.

But by a Senate amendment to the present bill the great question, to wit, the eventual reclamation of these lands, is now appropriately presented in a broader and loftier aspect. The amendment appropriates $250,000 towards a thorough hydrographic survey of all our western desert lands with a view of furnishing reliable data on which Congress can subsequently act with that degree of wisdom which should always and which usually does characterize the proceedings of this body.

I apprehend plainly the difficulties under which the advocates of this amendment are laboring. We are on the eve of a Presidential election and the party to which I belong being in power and justly feeling itself responsible for an economical administration of the Government, should be prudent in the expenditure of the people's money.

But in recognizing this fact we should not overlook that broad line running between decent generosity to posterity and short-sighted, time-serving, niggardly economy which would reap a benefit to-day, however cheap, at an expense to the future, however great.

It is an easy matter for a mere politician to vote no on all appropriations and demonstrate to his constituents his zeal in defending their property from the violent attack of other less conscientious and less ardent public servants. But the real servant of the people, seeking only to do with courage what he knows to be best for his country, would scorn such motives in others; in himself he could not scorn them, for in himself they could not be. And if this House will banish all personal considerations, and rise to the full height of patriotic statesmanship, viewing the question in no other light than that which future benefits will shed about it, we will have no difficulty in speedily adopting the amendment placed by the Senate on this bill.

This measure comes from the Senate with the indorsement of the Secretary of the Interior communicating a report of Maj. John W. Powell, of the Geological Survey of the United States, an officer who indeed stands to this measure "like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." In his valuable report, on page 5, is found this language:

The area of the arid region is about 1,300,000 square miles. Of this, about one-fifth is too rugged or too elevated to admit of cultivation under any condition of agriculture likely to arise for a century to come. A smaller fraction consists of playas, or drainless desert plains, so flat that it is impossible to wash the salts from their soils. There remain about 1,000,000 square miles of land which need only water to be rendered productive. At the minimum price of public land, $1.25 per acre, a price greater than its value for pasturage, this land has a valuation of $800,000,000; at $30 per acre, a moderate estimate of its value when irrigated, it would be worth $19,200,000,000. For the irrigation of this area we have the annual precipitation upon 1,300,000 square miles of mountain, valley, and plain. This ranges from 5 inches or less on the driest plains to 30 inches on the mountains, and even 75 or 100 inches on the highest peaks, and the average for the whole region is not far from 15 inches.

If all this could be applied to the land suited by configuration for cultivation it would afford about 20 inches of water annually for the whole area, or nearly double the amount which need be applied to crops during the growing season. The water which falls in the arid region would therefore fully meet the agricultural needs if only it could be stored until the proper season and then conveyed to the proper land. Unfortunately, many causes conspire to render impossible the full realization of so desirable a result.

Of the precipitation, which has the form of snow, a large fraction is returned to the air by evaporation without going through the process of melting. Of that which falls as rain, a large part is received by the soil and evaporated from it without gathering in streams, and the only portion of such unconcentrated rainfall serviceable for agriculture is that which falls on the farming land during the growing season. Of the water from rain and melted snow which gathers in channels and forms streams, only a portion has such relation to arable land that it can be utilized; the remainder flows too low or at such distance from the land as to be beyond the economic limits of conveyance. Moreover, a comparatively small portion of the stream water is furnished during the farming season, and that which must be stored in reservoirs in order to utilize it necessarily suffers material loss by evaporation.

Under such adverse conditions it is manifest that only a small portion of the rainfall of the region can be made to serve the farmer, and that there is no solid foundation for the opinion sometimes expressed that the greater part of our arid West will ultimately be reclaimed. In 1880 less than 1 per cent. of its arable portion had been supplied with irrigation water, and it is not believed that with the most elaborate irrigation works this can be increased to more than 20 per cent. On the other hand, an estimate based on such data as are available leads to the anticipation that when all the larger streams have been brought under control, and the storage of water has been carried as far as it may be economically, there will be redeemed about 15 per cent. of the region, or 150,000 square miles, the whole comprehending an area which exceeds one-half of the land now cultivated in the United States. At $30 per acre, this will add $2,880,000,000 to the wealth of the nation.

The establishment of a general system of irrigation on a comprehensive plan is of immediate importance, because the agriculture of the arid region, now in its infancy, is rapidly developing, and its development without suitable regulation constantly involves the use of temporary plans which interfere with and obstruct the adoption of those necessary to the fullest utilization of our resources.

I will not consume the time of the House by further allusion to this report, which in itself is so convincing that every negative vote will argue ignorance of its contents or carelessness of the public weal.

Mr. Speaker, the future action of Congress is in no manner handicapped by this appropriation. The appropriation only contemplates a survey of the arid region with a view to its improvement without compromising the Government in the least degree to the adoption of any policy which the facts may suggest. I can not produce an instance more apposite than when the friends of Western improvement many years ago besought Congress for an appropriation for railroad surveys between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. Who will deny that the light thus thrown on those regions led to the construction of the iron belt which now, many times, binds ocean to ocean and people to people?

While we may dissent from the subsequent generous and unnecessary donations of the public lands to these railroad corporations, yet none will be found so stupid as to question the value of that survey. So it will prove again in this instance, and with this additional advantage, that we are attempting to save the land to the people, and convert the now dreary desert into a paradise of happy homes. You who are inclined to consider the present scheme chimerical or visionary have been careless in your study of the history of man's conflict with nature, and of his victory over the most terrible obstacles. Irrigation is no new question. It existed in Egypt before the pyramids were erected. It has fed the millions of Asia since the creation of the world. It nurtured Rome into existence, and was practiced in America ages before the birth of Columbus, and yet the people of the United States east of the Mississippi River know but little about it.

The Moors introduced irrigation into Spain, and the Spaniards imported an imperfect system into Mexico, Texas, and California. The valley of the Nile has yielded its fruitful abundance from irrigated lands for countless ages, and Cato wrote learnedly, in a language now dead, advocating its introduction into Italy. Modern times have made their greatest achievement in the improvement of the system of irrigation in the East Indies by the British Government of India. Irrigation there antedates all history. The great Mogul we know gave it a grand impetus during the magnificence of his reign.

The wealth and grandeur of royal Babylon, of Nineveh, Thebes, Bagdad, Cairo, and Memphis, around which, as common centers, the civilization of great periods of time revolved, were due to and dependent on the agricultural perfection surrounding them, and made possible only by irrigation. The Nile supported the Roman world, and irrigated Egypt was the granary of the empire. As was well said by one from whom I have already largely drawn, a predecessor of mine on this floor, who honors me with his friendship:

The Egyptian people were overthrown and vanquished, but their system of irrigation survived and gave sustenance to Roman civilization, and remained intact throughout all the vicissitudes and changes. If anything, irrigation was better in the days of Semiramis than in the days of Boabdil, although, like the other concomitants of the beautiful Alhambra, orchards, vineyards, and meadows, as then seen along the banks of the Guadalquiver, speak of a splendid development, both material and intellectual. The Moors obtained from their Arab progenitors a taste for astronomy and some inclination toward practical mathematics, and to some extent we find applied mathemathics in its crude state assisting in making large portions of their country bloom and blossom as the rose by the ingenious devices which the Moors had of supplying water to the gardens, orchards, vineyards, and beautiful meadows which dotted old Hispania during their occupancy.

It is a fact which can not be controverted, that after the reconquest of Spain and the expulsion of the Moriscoes, Spain began to decline. The splendid schools of Granada and the numerous manufactories of Valencia and other places gradually faded away and left Spain without any support save that which she gathered by the sword, for she had neglected almost entirely her irrigation system; and the apology for one which we have, and which was found in California when that State was acquired, is the system handed down by the successors of those Spaniards who vanquished and expelled the Moriscoes from Spain.

Shall it be said of the American Congress of the nineteenth century that it was less able to cope with physical difficulty and less able to provide for the prosperity of its future than the people whom we dimly see groping about in the uncertain dawn of history? It is to be hoped that the enlightenment of this age and the statesmanship of this Congress, drawing knowledge from the experience of nations, may provide wisely against the dangers which are rushing to the attack of our matchless Republic.

Mr. Speaker, this brings us to the consideration of this question in its most important aspect. Both sides of this Chamber have been vieing with each other in expressions of sympathy for those who bear the heat and burden of the day throughout their honest lives. I would like to believe that both are sincere. We have before us now a true test of that professed sympathy, for the present amendment if adopted will do more to alleviate the pain and lighten in years to come the burdens of our laboring classes than all other measures now before Congress combined.

Talk as you please of tariff duties and the effect of protection on wages; talk as you may about protecting American labor against the pauper labor of the older world; make what political capital you can by scaring the timid poor with the senseless cry of free trade; draw, if you wish, a darker background for the picture of despair you are now painting, but amid it all you know, and I know, and every man should know that American labor has been kept up generally to a decent living point, not by artificial enactments, but by the physical fact of a land vent and the industry and intelligence of the laborers themselves.

Wages here are high because good land has been cheap. That character of land is almost exhausted. When it shall have been fully occupied can you conceive of any mere enactment of Congress that will prevent the poor and ignorant from being still deeper steeped in poverty and ignorance? Can you pass a mere law that of itself will raise the daily earnings of the wage-worker? Will a protective tariff or any kindred policy drive want from the door of unemployed labor? What is the remedy? It is simply more land for the landless unemployed, more possible homes for the homeless. This amendment anticipates coming wants and for centuries postpones any degradation of American labor. More land can be reclaimed, and cheaply reclaimed, by wise and speedy action in the line of this amendment than is now occupied east of the Mississippi River.

What is the present character of this land which is ultimately to be reclaimed by irrigation? A somewhat overdrawn description is to be found in an Australian Report on American Irrigation. The writer gives this description of our western arid region:

The irrigated lands of America, though widely various, may be divided into two great classes. The rolling prairies of Kansas and sloping uplands of Colorado belong to one division. Poor and brown in ordinary seasons, their buffalo and bunch grasses are often green after favorable spring rains, and it seems but natural that, when a constant supply of water is secured, these treeless expanses should be gradually conquered by the march of settlement from thickly inhabited and closely cultivated districts. Not so with the sandy wastes stretching in a broad belt from the north to the south and southwest of the arid region. Here there is no prospect of any early invasion due to pressure of population or overflow from crowded towns. Here there is nothing to attract and everything to repel. Here even the rich red mesa lands that lie under the shadow of the foothills are desolate at all times and all seasons—so desolate that it seems impossible they should ever sustain a living thing. From them the illimitable desert, bare and blinding in its glaring barrenness, stretches far away to the mirage towers that shift along a dull and undefined horizon. Much of the soil is so powdery, even in winter, that it follows in a lazy trail of cloud the horse of the solitary rider, or is sucked up in whirlwinds under the scorching summer sun. Elsewhere its gravelly and gritty surfaces, strewn with splintered bowlders, are seamed into gaping gulches and fissures of inappeasable thirst. There is no grass, the only vegetation being a withered-looking brush resembling saltbush, the thirsty-looking cactus, a juiceless scrub like our ti-tree, or thorny variety of stunted palm.

Such is the Mapimi Desert in Mexico, the Maricopa Desert in Arizona, or the Mojave Desert in California; and such, without water, they must remain. As it is, these wastes of sandy aridity and gray, innutritious herbage, surrendered by nature to solitude, surround oases created and sustained by irrigation. In the distance the track of a canal, pleasantly breaking the dull level of the dried-up plain, is marked sometimes for miles by a line of green bushes following its sinuous course. By and by this line broadens as if into a great green plantation dotted with houses, divided into gardens, and decked with flowers. Its little fields, fringed with flourishing trees, are bright with fresh-springing pasture, upon which stock are grazing, or else crowded with dark orange groves and clustering vines. In the center of it is a tiny township, busy with teams and traders, where the train stops for a moment or two. When it starts again the houses and trees vanish as if by enchantment, and the engine rushes on through the dreary desert once more.

It is thus that the eye bears testimony to the fruits of irrigation in the south; and in the north, though in a less striking way, the lesson is the same. The unpretentious ditches that wind along the hillsides or prairie ridges are not notable themselves until it is perceived that, where they are not, a scattered herd of rough cattle, a small party of roving Indians, or a burly rancher are the only objects of interest, while, where they multiply, are the buildings, the barns, and the business. A stretch of open country broken by long ridges of canals, its paddocks plotted off into little checks, with a barefooted Chinaman or high-booted European, spade in hand, directing the water from one to the other, are common features of the landscape, where one beholds industry and intelligence transmuting barren surfaces into orchards and fields of waving grain. Familiar, too, are the knots of active men, the little camp of tents, and toiling teams that mark the progress of a new ditch into the wilderness, where it is to create a settlement and maintain it in the face of all seasons. The Indian village, the Mexican pueblo, the American township, all cluster about the natural stream, or the artificial stream which makes it serviceable. For in these parched regions its progress is everywhere a triumphal march. It is here veritably the water of life—life to the grass and flower, to the loaded tree, to man, and to the city of men, whose homesteads and harvests follow in its wake.

Such a prospect as here described faced the Western pioneer on his awful march toward the setting sun. Brave hearts and willing hands alone would ever have taken up the gantlet that desolated nature had here thrown down. Yet all undaunted their terrible struggle was begun with a courage that time has been unable to lessen or danger to dissipate. In the few short years that the Government of the United States has held impotent sway in my Territory the brave and manly people have been obliged to make their warfare against the natural desolation of the land with rifle in hand to protect life against the hostile Apache, and I point with pride to their achievements.

In the Salt River Valley alone eight main canals have been constructed to bring the water from the river upon the cultivated land. These canals aggregate a distance of 160 miles, and were constructed at a cost of $1,000,000. The land along these canals, which a few years ago was a veritable desert, are now the most productive fields on earth. Yet this transformation from arid waste to blooming field has been accomplished by private enterprise in the face of the most adverse circumstances. But in these enterprises only the water from the flowing stream has been used. There is not enough of this to reclaim all the desert land in Arizona. Other and more expensive means must now be resorted to.

The surface flow from the mountains, hills, and mesas, and the overflows of the rivers and streams must be preserved in reservoirs for use in the dry season. Private enterprise will never do this except in the form of monopoly. The Government for its own protection and for the well-being of the people must assume this duty. There never was and there never will be a more auspicious time than now for the Government to take the necessary preliminary steps by commencing this survey and investigation. This great question should no longer be left to private enterprise. True, such enterprise has accomplished wonders.

The real development of irrigation in the West has taken place mainly within the last fifteen years. Within that time it has been lifted out of rudeness into something like science. The strides it has taken may be judged by the 12,000 miles of main canals in the West, costing millions on millions of dollars.

Even at the expense of proving wearisome, I can not forbear taking the following extract from the report of our consul in Egypt:

IRRIGATION.

Were it not, in fact, for irrigation there would never have been an historical, a scientific, a classical Egypt. God granted it natural irrigation, and this, aided by artificial works, once gave to Egypt a material existence as grand as its monuments are enduring. Since it is due alone to the employment of the waters of the Nile that agriculture is known in Egypt, and since agriculture is the base of all wealth here, it must be deduced, the wealth of old Egypt being far greater than that of the Egypt of to-day, that these waters were once more widely employed; that they were made to feed the crops of more extended agricultural districts. History as well as the silent evidences of the past proves this, and evidences of to-day begin to show a broader and growing conception of the value of irrigation. The spirit of advancement in this direction was evidenced in the works of Mohammed Ali, in the Barrage, and in the grand canals he opened. Ismail Pasha also pushed with great vigor schemes of irrigation; and Thewfik is lending all the aid he can towards their enlargement.

The curious historical and scientific researches of a citizen of the United States have unfolded a huge plan of irrigation, known to the ancients, and the present Egyptian Government at this time seems disposed, after at first turning a deaf ear to his propositions, to profit by this man's philosophy. The darkness which spread over Egypt in the Byzantine period, and which grew denser still under the supremacy of the Mamelukes, was dispelled by Mohammed Ali, and, unless foreign power again re-establishes decay, it may be expected that in a few generations it will be entirely dispelled.

The processes of irrigation are just about as they were thousands of years ago. Partial use of steam power has created slight changes, but the shadoof and the sakeeyek are yet supreme, and, in fact, as they are worked, it may be said they have no superior.

The shadoof is made of two posts about 5 feet high, set into the earth 3 feet apart and joined at the tops by a horizontal bar. Across this bar is slung a pole or a branch of a tree, having at one end a weight composed of mud, and at the other, suspended by two palm stalks, a bucket made of basket-work, or matting, or of a hoop with woolen stuff or leather. This is worked by one man, who is able with its use to raise water about 8 feet. Where it is necessary to raise water to a greater height, two or more of these machines are employed. Appliances of a similar nature for lifting water from wells are common in parts of the United States.

The ancient Egyptians utilized the waters of the Nile for irrigation to a greater degree than the Egyptians of to-day. They put into practical operation measures only dreamed of at this time, for many of the channel ways of some of the old canals are now wholly unknown. The ancients cultivated more soil than the moderns; they produced greater crops; they were possessed of greater wealth. One ancient Egyptian king had more money in his private vaults than is now contributed in a twelvemonth to the entire Egyptian Government. The great wealth of old was derived from proper distribution and utilization of the waters of the Nile, and it is to the resolution of this subject that moderns must address themselves if they would free Egypt from the oppressions of the European bondholders. Mohammed Ali inaugurated a new Nile era. Had he lived till now Egypt would have been one of the very greatest nations of the East. It would have been re-enthroned in grandeur and riches. The Barrage has been at last put into practical operation with great beneficial effects, but this is only the beginning of what may be done.

A GRAND SCHEME.

Under the head of "irrigation" reference was made to a huge plan of irrigation unfolded by an American. When Herodotus visited Egypt, B. C. 454, he enumerated various great monuments and public works. Among these he included the Pyramids, but to them he failed to give so great prominence as was given to a vast artificial reservoir, which, in his own words, "excelled all other human productions." "The circuit of its coast," said the historian, "is 60 schoenes, or 3,600 furlongs, which is equal to the entire length of the seacoast of the Delta. It stretches in its longest direction from north to south, and in its deepest parts is of the depth of 50 fathoms. The water of the lake does not come out of the ground, which is here excessively dry, but is introduced by a canal from the Nile. The current sets for six months into the lake from the river, and for the next six months into the river from the lake. While it runs outward it returns a talent of silver (about $1,060) daily to the royal treasury from the fish that are taken in the canal, but when the current is the other way the return sinks to one-third of that sum."

The Ionian historian was careful to repeat the measurements in such a way as to avoid any possibility of error on the part of his copyist. The circumference of the lake was given by the schoene, an Egyptian unit of length, a day's tow, and could be compared to the distance which separates Alexandria from Port Said. He took pains to insert that the furlong was a hundred fathoms, or 600 feet. The depth, also, he repeated, is one-half of a hundred fathoms, or half a furlong. About five centuries later Diodorus from Sicily, Strabo from Asia Minor, Mutianus and Pliny from Rome repeat what was evidently a wide belief regarding a well-ascertained fact.

Diodorus said the utility of the lake deserved the highest praise, and its greatness was incredible. "Considering," he said, "the benefit and advantage brought to the Government by this great work, none could ever sufficiently extol it according to what the truth of the thing deserved." He explained in lucid terms its unique character.

But I must hasten, as my time is nearly exhausted. As I have before said, Arizona's desert lands can only be reclaimed by Government action in storing the surface waters and by developing artesian wells. Much of the land of that much-slandered Territory is now a desert. As long as it remains such it will remain a disgrace to the inaction of the Federal Government. These deserts can be reclaimed. They must be reclaimed, they will be reclaimed, for, as quoted by the gifted and scholarly member from New York [Mr. COX] the other day in his beautiful speech in favor of this amendment:

For the Lord shall comfort Zion: He will comfort all her waste places: and He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord: joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody.

The Lord uses strange means sometimes to effect His kindly providence. The Fiftieth Congress, let us hope, will here serve the purpose in reclaiming these lands; and when reclaimed what will it not produce? As to my own Territory I can speak advisedly. Every semi-tropical fruit and every product of the temperate zone can be produced in "prodigal profusion." You who favor "home industries" can drive the Spanish olives from this continent. Nowhere will the orange grow to greater perfection. It is the natural home of the fig.

The "blushing vine hills of delightful France" can not surpass us in their product or equal us in the beauty of scenery or salubrity of climate. Our possibilities are measureless. The desert can be made to bloom as the rose. The waste places can be made glad and all for far less money than you have appropriated to the improvement of our rivers and harbors.

The Treasury is bursting with its accumulated gold. Our people are not niggardly. Give back to their posterity what you have taken from them and they will be content. Of their money make happy homes for their children's children.

The available agricultural lands are nearly exhausted. The overcrowded laborer seeking a Western home finds a useless desert staring him in the face. You took from him your hoarded wealth. Will you not give him a chance to live? He, and thousands like him, asks no bounty of you. They only want justice at your hands. They demand, and have a right to demand, that you with the means which they have afforded shall do your part toward the proper development of our wonderful resources.

Projects are now on foot for large expenses in the construction of a navy and in coast defenses. This is well enough; but one man owning his home in a land he loves, with his family about him, is worth more to his country in time of need than a whole company of hired soldiers. In war he is the ready, brave, and faithful volunteer. It is he who will honor his flag and die for his country. Sirs, make homes for your people. Save your lands from monopoly. Redeem the arid regions, and thus in your prudent watch care over the people's interest, your patriotic statesmanship, your provision for future prosperity, emulate the example of our fathers who gave our matchless Government to the admiration of the world, and to our people unexampled prosperity, liberty, and happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. SYMES. I reserve the remainder of my time until I hear from the other side.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that my friend from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has come squarely up to this measure and avows the object sought, i. e., to have the Government do this work; for it thereby presents it to Congress stripped of all extraneous matter, and the broad proposition is before us whether we are ready to enter upon the work of constructing irrigating canals which he says it is designed to accomplish and which he advocates. These things always begin in a small way. I remember when the Geological Survey was inaugurated, and before it had reached its present magnitude it was under a proposition to survey the lands in the Territories; a very innocent proceeding, and one that was said to be of vast importance to the United States. Then came the proposition to extend that survey into the States a few years ago, with the claim made that it was of great importance to them, and that it would give to the people such a survey of their mineral resources in all the States as had not hitherto been had. Years have rolled by, and if this Geological Survey has found anything new in the State of my friend from Alabama I have not yet heard of it.

If they have added anything to the surveys made by Professor Safford and others in Tennessee, I have heard nothing of it. If they have added anything new to the geological surveys made by Professor Owen, Professor Proctor, and others in the State of Kentucky, I have heard nothing of it. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been doled out to them as they have demanded, and still the work perpetually goes on, and its completion becomes perennially hopeless.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SYMES. Have not the geological surveys made during the time mentioned by the gentleman included a great many specific geological surveys of some of the richest mining districts in the Rocky Mountains, and have not these surveys in many cases, and the reading of the reports describing the geological formations of these mineral districts resulted in the development of mines and the addition of millions and millions of precious metals to the wealth of this country?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have not visited the Rocky Mountains. I am talking of that portion of the continent with which I am familiar, and I have announced a proposition concerning it that the gentleman even in all the zeal of his advocacy of this proposition will not dispute. We were told that the work could be done in a few years. There were a number of us in the beginning of these surveys in the States who held that there was no use for the Government of the United States making geological surveys within the States. But there was a clamor for it; the clamor was heeded, and the surveys were entered upon. I believe it has been about eight years since that was done; and, as we are told in the statement made by my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] a few moments ago, it will now take thirty years to complete them, whereas four years ago it was announced that twenty-four years would be sufficient to make the surveys.

We are asked to give new powers, to open new fields, give more millions to this surveying party for the accomplishment of what?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. To levy more taxes.

Mr. McMILLIN. To levy more taxes, to squander more money. If you do this you will have additional burdens of taxation. By the creation of these reservoirs it is said that ninety-odd million acres of land can be reclaimed that can not now be cultivated except by irrigation.

Now, the gentleman from Arizona does not come at this matter in any covert way. He comes at it like the candid, fearless man he is, saying that it is a work the Government ought to do, and he advocates it as a Government work.

Taking the whole field together, the remoteness from water of a vast quantity of it and the fact that the dams and reservoirs will have to be maintained in their places, is there a gentleman here who supposes that it can be done for an average of less than $10 per acre? Do you propose to enter upon a policy which will add to the taxes of the people of the United States, now excessive, and to the present bonded indebtedness under which they are groaning? If so——

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. McMILLIN. I can not yield. My time is too limited.

Mr. SYMES. I would like to correct the gentleman; and that is why I wish to interrupt him.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has plenty of time in which to answer. I dislike to appear discourteous, but I must insist upon going ahead. Now I undertake to say that it can not be done at an average of much less, taking all the arid region, than $10 an acre; and I want to know whether any gentleman is in favor of duplicating the present bonded indebtedness, or of levying taxes equal to the present bonded indebtedness for this purpose?

I like the announcement of my friend who sits before me [Mr. FELTON], and who stated the true doctrine of American and republican government—"that the Government of the United States ought to do nothing that the citizen could do." As long as we adhere to that principle we can not go far wrong; but whenever we depart from it for the purposes of building reservoirs to the extent that we do depart from that doctrine by this measure we go away from good government. I undertake to say that if somebody else would build these canals and reservoirs and the different appliances necessary to reclaim these lands the Government of the United States could not afford to accept them as a donation and run them. The hundred thousand officers and employés that we now have would be run up to a quarter of a million, requiring thousands and tens of thousands of dollars, and in place of having my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] as we now have him with one Committee on Labor we would have twenty such committees. [Laughter.]

Now, how much is proposed to be given here? Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars under this bill to be used by this bureau. We have become a little too much of a bureaucratic government to suit me.

We have already given more than $600,000 to this bureau for this year and now they want $250,000 more, and that is but a nest-egg for future operations. Next year it will take, they say, a million dollars, and a million a year for five years succeeding. Is this Congress ready to give all the millions that may be demanded to all the projects that may be conjured up in the fruitful brains of any bureau chiefs?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. It will be only a million a year until we get it all done.

Mr. McMILLIN. A million a year. Five millions for the work of survey, and you, my friend, have said that then the Government ought to do the work of building and operating this system. That is just where I want to make the fight. I say that if it is to be done the Government ought not to do it. I say the Government could not afford to accept it as a donation and "run" it.

Mr. HERBERT. At the rate of one million a year it would take a million of years to get through.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have seldom known any man in Washington to work himself out of a job, and it is very difficult to repeal even a clerkship, or a desk in a bureau, or a bureau itself. They all run in the opposite direction. The clerkship of to-day is the bureau of to-morrow, and the bureau soon buds into a Department. Now, I think the best time to halt in this matter is just as we are about to begin. The lands are there; they are not going away. Does any man suppose that the private enterprise and the individual energy of this great American people are not sufficient for any emergency that may arise? Already your farming lands almost all over the United States are running down. That proposition will not be denied by anybody; and will you tax the people who own these lands millions of dollars to be put into other localities?

As our country fills up with population and these lands are needed, American genius and American enterprise and American capital will do the work that is necessary for their reclamation. I have no fear that if this Congress fails to appropriate all the money that is in the Treasury for purposes not hitherto appropriated for, those who come after us will go to ruin. I think the next generation will be able to take care of itself.

This Congress has been prodigal beyond necessity, and still we are asked not only to appropriate a quarter of a million dollars now, but to lay the foundation for five millions of appropriations in the next five years. We have appropriated for all sorts of schemes heretofore. I remember standing in this House a few years ago protesting against an appropriation for the building of reservoirs on the Upper Mississippi. The claim was that they were being constructed for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River in summer by damming up water in winter to be turned loose in summer, and I stated that the proposition, as a mental performance, would disgrace an idiot. [Laughter.] I never yet have seen a man who was fool enough to believe that the reservoirs built there have improved the navigation of the Mississippi River, but I have no doubt that some excellent gentlemen have got some very fine water-powers for strictly private uses without cost to themselves.

Now, it is claimed that one benefit to result from the scheme before us will be that the water will be caught and collected in these reservoirs, and that thus the summer overflow of the Mississippi will be prevented. After having made the comment I have made concerning the other proposition, which is in the past, I will not be uncharitable enough to compare this with it; but I do not think it is wise to make this proposed appropriation. I think this Congress ought to be satisfied with the millions of dollars it has already appropriated. I think they ought to be sufficient to satisfy any ordinary ambition in the direction of prodigality.

For one, I have no desire to rival the Prodigal Son in his most prodigal days, and we are in a fair way of doing that if we do not call a halt. My friend from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] is here advocating this proposition, and the next thing we shall hear of him will be that he is making the welkin of Colorado ring with the statement that there is no surplus in the Treasury to make a revision of the tariff necessary, that this is the most prodigal Congress that has ever assembled here, and that it has squandered more of the public money than was ever squandered by any preceding Congress under any administration. I can see that in him right now, and he will not deny it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I deny that impeachment for the present and for the future. I wish to say that I consider myself to-day in the affairs of government, municipal, State, and national, more of a practical economist than my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. I would appropriate money to add to the value of the public domain; I would appropriate money that should benefit the future settlers upon that domain. Other gentlemen in this Hall would appropriate, as I heard them say the other day on the other side and on this side of the House, ten millions for a Library building that might attract the attention of distinguished architects from Europe. I would not. I would erect a Library building so plain and simple that the architects from the Old World, when in the future they may come over here, would not view a structure similar to the Coliseum and Parthenon of ancient times, which have excited the wonder and admiration of the artists of all countries for ages. No, sir; I would not expend the people's money in trying to rival the Old World in art or architecture; but I would erect a Library building so plain and simple in its architectural design that it would attract the attention of artists on account of its simplicity, and not on account of its expensive grandeur. And I would place within it more of the treasures of intellect than is found in any similar structure of ancient or modern times. [Applause.] I would not aim at beauty of architecture, which might attract the eye of the uncultured and thoughtless, as well as the æsthetic; but I would add to the treasures of the Library millions of valuable manuscripts and books which the intelligent people of America might read and study. The gentleman has not found me voting for any architectural extravagance of that sort.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No; I am aware that the gentleman has voted with me on that proposition, and to that extent he is right. I regret to say at the same time that the gentleman's party has not generally voted with him on that question.

Mr. SYMES. I call upon the House to bear witness that I am never disposed to bring in partisan politics where they do not belong; and they do not belong here.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It does not belong anywhere when you are seeking an appropriation. But when a political canvass is pending, I have never known the gentleman's party to ease up on questions of this kind.

Mr. SYMES. Yes; and the only thing that endangers the success of this amendment is the fact that we are within sixty days of a Presidential election; otherwise the amendment would be carried by a four-fifths majority.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I must not permit my friend to carry the House off into the labyrinths of that extensive building, which ought never to be erected on the foundations proposed for it, by an expenditure of $10,000,000. I want to know from the gentleman whether he is in favor of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] for the Government to do this work?

Mr. SYMES. I answered substantially the inquiry of my friend from Tennessee during the course of my remarks a week ago last Saturday. I said then, as I say now, that I do not advocate and I see no necessity, during my lifetime or that of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the Government should enter into the business of building dams, accumulating water, constructing canals, ditches, and subditches, and distributing the water and selling it by Government agents. If such a thing were proposed at this time I would speak against it. I am not now advocating such a proposition, but simply that the Government reserve its own reservoir sites and water and land for the benefit of the people in the future.

The dispatch I read this morning from the deep-harbor convention is that these reservoirs be turned over to the States. That can be settled hereafter. First secure their control by the United States before it is too late.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman is not in favor of this work being done by the Government I would like to know why he wants to spend over $5,000,000 in making a survey that is to come to naught. I think the proposition is wrong. It could never have come in here regularly on one of our appropriation bills. But this bill comes back from the Senate, and the Senate, following its custom, has undertaken to ride us down with appropriations which would not be in order in the House on these bills. I believe that this proposition ought to be rejected. I think we shall serve the public interest by doing so.

Mr. SYMES. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this is a question in which I feel a great deal of interest and to which I have given some attention and thought. I can not in the period of time allotted to me undertake to elaborate the views I entertain in regard to it. I wish I had time to express myself fully. I believe I could say some things that would be interesting to the House, and possibly useful in the discussion. But though I can not say what I would like, I am gratified by the courtesy of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] to have an opportunity to express my hearty approval of the proposed amendment and to identify myself in the RECORD with this great measure. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that this is the most important measure in its possible eventualities which has been considered by this Congress, though it is probable the reasons I have for saying that are wholly different from those which that gentleman would assign. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] who has just taken his seat has spoken of the prodigality with which appropriations have been made by this Congress.

I regret that his animadversions and criticisms on that account are too well founded. I wish to say for myself, however, that against all these prodigal and extravagant expenditures against which the gentleman from Tennessee complains, whether great or small, I have opposed myself with resolute obstinacy. I have voted against them with great regularity and persistency, but I am for this amendment. It advances a proposition which in no possible sense savors of a personal enterprise. It is not local in its character; it is not even sectional; it is national in the broadest and highest acceptation of the term.

What does this amendment propose? It proposes to appropriate $250,000 to inaugurate and prosecute extensive surveys in what is known as the arid region of the country, to locate its boundaries accurately, to ascertain where natural reservoirs may be established for the storage of water supplies, to ascertain the extent and location of these desert or arid lands which may be reclaimed and restored to agricultural uses by a system of irrigation, and to suggest the best and most practicable methods of irrigation. It provides also that all lands which may be utilized and made valuable by irrigation shall after the passage of this bill be withdrawn from sale or other disposition until such time as Congress shall provide for disposing of them. That is the sum and substance of the amendment. That is the whole proposition.

Gentlemen oppose the amendment because they say it is the incipient step towards inaugurating a vast system of irrigation which is to involve the Government in an expenditure of indefinite millions. But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who assail the pending proposition on any such ground as that are running too fast; they are galloping too furiously.

The proposition which the House is now called upon to consider does not provide for any such thing as that. It is simply to prosecute a survey of these lands and to report the facts.

But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] contends that if this appropriation is made and the surveys are prosecuted, the Government thereby becomes committed to the policy of irrigation as a public work and at public expense, and in proof of that he points to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who expressed the opinion that the work of irrigating and reclaiming these waste lands ought to be done by the General Government. I do not know whether it ought to be done by the General Government or not. It certainly ought to be done by somebody. I am not now prepared to commit myself to any scheme, one way or the other. But these waste lands are there in the West—immense areas of them. They are useless for agriculture under existing conditions. What shall we do with them? Draw a line from the northern border of Texas (it ought to go east of the hundredth meridian) and extend it through the Indian Territory, through the heart of the great States of Kansas and Nebraska, and along the eastern line of Dakota to the British possessions. The immense empire west of that line, and between that line and the Pacific Ocean, is practically worthless under present conditions for agricultural purposes.

What are you going to do, then? The only way by which these lands can be reclaimed is by irrigation. What are you going to do? The gentleman from Tennessee says he wants to leave the whole matter to private enterprise. He is confident that private enterprise will solve the problem in due time. If it can be so accomplished, then let it be so done. Let the Government stand aloof and take no part in the prosecution of any system of irrigation if the work can be done without its intervention. I am opposed to the Government doing any thing of this character if it can be done by individual effort.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is private enterprise not doing it, I ask my friend?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Private enterprise certainly has done something in that way to a limited extent, and when the opportunities for irrigation are favorable it is possible, sir, and I certainly hope it is practicable, for private investment—for private effort to so exert itself as to reclaim and restore the whole of these lands to civilization. But if it can not be done in that way, if it is not practicable or possible, but on the contrary if it is impossible for it to be done by private enterprise, then I certainly would not hesitate for a moment to put the Government forward to take charge of it as a national work and prosecute it to a successful end.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Within the States?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Anywhere; wherever there are public lands. Certainly, within the States as well as within the Territories, for I am unable to conceive any reason why a distinction should be drawn.

Mr. Speaker, what we seek to do by this amendment is not to inaugurate a system of public works, but we are seeking information, reliable, accurate information, upon which the representatives of the people can rely, and upon which private enterprise can depend. The work is certainly worthy of the most serious consideration at the hands of the American Congress.

Whether this information when acquired may develop the necessity of irrigation as a public work remains to be seen. Let us get possession of the facts; let us comprehend the situation, and then act as wisdom, prudence, and the statesmanship of common sense may dictate. An empire of waste lies there awaiting the magic touch of industry to make it bloom. Out among the mountains and plains of this great arid West lies the secret of a splendid future. Mr. Speaker, while listening to this debate and looking at that map yonder, I tried to think of this vast region which is described as arid in this way—as a separate and independent republic, and to imagine that we were sitting in the Congress of that new republic deliberating on its public affairs. In my imagination I tried to picture some ambitious, but patriotic statesman of that republic of the occident standing on the summit of some stupendous mountain peak in the heart of the Rockies, where he had his whole country under his vision. As he gazed around him what would he behold? A territory greater by one-third than the combined areas of Great Britain, France, Italy, Austria, and the German Empire—five of the greatest nations of the earth, the homes of nearly 200,000,000 people, and representing the accumulations, the culture, and the civilization of the Saxon, the Gaul, the Teuton, and the Latin for twenty centuries and more—a territory greater than the Chinese Empire, or China proper, supporting a population of nearly 400,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I am sorry I have not time to go on and complete the view I was about to present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORNEY. I now yield to my colleague [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, it is a late hour in the day as well as a late hour in the discussion of this measure, and hence I shall not attempt any elaborate argument upon the question presented, but will proceed to give my views as plainly as I can set them forth on what I conceive to be the salient points involved in this controversy.

The object of the measure here presented, as I gather it from the report of the committee and from the arguments in favor of the proposition, is to put a large percentage of lands in the arid regions in our Western country in a condition to fit them for agricultural purposes, so that the people may avail themselves of these lands for such purposes in the near future.

Sir, I am not one of those who join unqualifiedly in the assertion that it is wise or for the public good to encourage an overrapid taking up of the public domain and the devotion of it to purposes of agriculture.

According to my observation, experience, and reading of other countries, I am convinced that the inevitable result will be when the lands fit for agricultural purposes in the United States are all taken up and devoted to such purposes that in exact proportion as that is done the grazing lands will disappear, and food products, especially meat products, will be found much dearer, and the battle of life for the poor man and for the laboring people of the country to obtain that character of food will be found to grow harder and harder as this process goes on. That is the history and the result in all of the older countries of which I have read.

While, sir, I admit that the people who are located upon lands and become rooted in the soil are more strongly attached to their country, for love of home and its sacred precincts is a sentiment which pervades nearly every human heart, yet there are other considerations which should enter into our action in dealing with this subject.

Mr. FUNSTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FUNSTON. I wish to ask whether in your opinion more cattle can be raised on cultivated soil than on wild soil?

Mr. OATES. Yes; at a very much higher cost.

Mr. FUNSTON. Oh, no, my friend; I have been familiar with that subject for some time, and on cultivated lands they are produced more cheaply and afford cheaper food.

Mr. OATES. According to your argument, it would be cheaper to raise cattle in New York than in Kansas, which is not a fact.

Mr. FUNSTON. It would be if they would raise them.

Mr. OATES. Ah; but it is never done. The lands are devoted to other purposes.

Mr. Speaker, while I would not stop the process of continued settlements upon the public domain, I do not believe it would be wise to greatly accelerate or stimulate it unduly. I think if there is any fault now to be found with our policy in that direction it is that settlement is progressing too rapidly rather than too slowly. Our policy, sir, for a number of years has been not only to give homes to all our people on the public domain, but to throw open the doors wide and invite all the foreigners of the world, tramps included, to come and occupy this great bounty of ours, the public domain. I think, sir, that the time has arrived in the history of this country when that practice, to a great extent, should cease and allow this process of taking up the public lands to go on gradually; and with such a policy inaugurated there is no present necessity for applying a stimulus for preparatory steps to be taken to induce the settlement and cultivation of these arid regions.

I admit, however, that in the distant future these lands, such as can be made useful for agriculture, will be demanded by the young men of this country in the course of natural growth, and therefore it seems to me that it may be prudent enough to withdraw certain districts or portions of these arid regions from sale.

I see from the testimony of Major Powell that the surveys which have been made and are now in progress, while not distinct enough for him to locate and designate all the different catchment basins and to segregate them one from another, yet they are distinct enough so that the neighborhood in which they lie, and where in all probability the reservoirs would be located, can easily be ascertained. The withdrawal of these districts from the market is all that seems to me to be necessary at this time.

But some gentlemen seem to have in contemplation at no distant day the engagement of the Government of the United States in the development of this work as outlined by Major Powell in creating these vast reservoirs in the catchment areas for the purpose of rendering the country thereabout fit for agriculture. For one, sir, that argument can have no favorable influence upon my mind in dealing with this proposition. I think my friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who just preceded me, was a little thoughtless in some of his remarks upon that line.

Why, sir, if gentlemen will recur to the fundamental law of this country they will find that Congress has no power to engage in works of that character. I see no necessity for any violation of or for exceeding the power with which the fundamental law has invested us. I for one decline to take such a course. The only power which Congress has over the public domain and territory of the United States is in the following clause of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States.

The latter proposition, to make rules respecting the territory, is daily exercised under the provisions that are made for the government of the Territories of the United States; but the first proposition, the power over the public lands of the United States that Congress has, is to provide for their disposal. Gentlemen seem to confound the right of Congress to legislate throughout the Territories and in the District of Columbia with power to do anything they please by way of improving the public lands. Why, sir, the two propositions are very distinct. If Congress has power to erect improvements on the public lands in order to put them in a condition for sale and to be profitable to the purchaser, I ask any lawyer or other member on this floor to tell me where there is any limit to the exercise of that power?

If, sir, you can put an improvement of $100,000 upon the public domain you can put $100,000,000. If the power exists it has no limit except in the discretion of Congress, which is no limit at all. I have never believed that Congress has any such power. It never was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to vest in Congress that extent of power in respect to the public lands.

And now, sir, as to the utility and practicability of the scheme, let me say that while I have a great respect for Major Powell I can not always agree with him. He is a scientist. He is a very learned gentleman, and the testimony he gave before the Senate committee is to me quite interesting reading. But he, like all other scientists, is liable to err in his conclusions. The conclusions he draws from the premises strike me as exceedingly erroneous, Mr. Speaker, in respect to the Mississippi River. That has been frequently alluded to by gentlemen in the course of this debate, but I desire to read a portion of the testimony, which strikes me with peculiar force, in which he speaks of the disastrous floods or overflows of the Mississippi, which he thinks can be entirely prevented by a recourse to scientific methods and damming up the waters in reservoirs. He says:

> Pardon me, perhaps it is egotistical to say so, but I have studied this subject for many years and I am satisfied that the yearly overflow of the valley of the Mississippi could be prevented and the whole of that vast area, now flooded annually or from time to time, could be redeemed and made dry by storing the water on the great plains.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it would take more money to accomplish that, if it could possibly be done at all, than the whole national debt ever did amount to. I do not believe that it is practicable at all, because if anything in all this land is a law unto itself it is the Mississippi River.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion of what I have to say I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from that great humorist, Mark Twain, from his "Life on the Mississippi," as an illustration of the science involved in this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Since my own day on the Mississippi, cut-offs have been made at Hurricane Island, at Island One Hundred, at Napoleon, Ark., at Walnut Bend, and at Council Bend. These shortened the river, in the aggregate, 67 miles. In my own time a cut-off was made at American Bend which shortened the river 10 miles or more.
>
> Therefore, the Mississippi between Cairo and New Orleans was 1,215 miles long one hundred and seventy-six years ago. It was 1,180 after the cut-off of 1722. It was 1,040 after the American Bend cut-off. It has lost 67 miles since. Consequently its length is only 973 miles at present.
>
> Now if I wanted to be one of those ponderous scientific people and "let on" to prove what had occurred in the remote past by what had occurred in a given time in the recent past, or what will occur in the far future by what has occurred in late years, what an opportunity is here! Geology never had such a chance, nor such exact data to argue from, nor development of species either!
> Glacial epochs are great things, but they are vague, vague. Please observe: In the space of one hundred and seventy-six years the Lower Mississippi has shortened itself 242 miles. This is an average of a trifle over 1 mile and a third per year. Therefore, any calm person, who is not blind or idiotic, can see that in the old Oölitic Silurian period, just a milllion years ago next November, the Lower Mississippi River was upwards of 1,300,000 miles long, and stuck out over the Gulf of Mexico like a fishing rod. And by the same token any person can see that seven hundred and forty-two years from now the Lower Mississippi will be onlya mile and three-quarters long, and Cairo and New Orleans will have joined their streets together, and be plodding comfortably along under a single mayor and a mutual board of aldermen. There is something fascinating about science. One gets such wholesale returns of conjecture out of such a trifling investment of fact.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SYMES. Will my friend yield for a suggestion?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYMES. I understand that that is cited and considered as the most reliable authority upon the side of the opponents of this bill.

Mr. OATES. I think it equally as good as the authority of the advocates of the bill, and I prefer it.

Mr. SYMES. That is what I understand to be your position. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to inquire whether it is the purpose of the gentleman in charge of this bill to have a vote upon the amendment this afternoon?

Mr. FORNEY. No; not until to-morrow; but I want to get on as far as possible this evening.

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, during the month of July, when this bill was first considered in the House, I offered substantially the same amendment as we are now discussing. The amendment was ruled out upon a point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], but through the courtesy of that gentleman I was permitted to submit some remarks upon the merits of the amendment. In addition to what was then submitted I have but a few remarks to make.

Some time ago when the public-land bill was under consideration in the House gentlemen upon this floor offered certain amendments to meet their views of what the law should be, and expressed grave apprehension lest the remaining public lands of the United States should be largely dominated and controlled by the cattle barons and syndicates formed for speculative purposes. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the fears then expressed were not entirely without foundation. To persons at all familiar with what is denominated "the arid regions" of the United States the fact is undeniable that the ownership of the water frontage and water supply is tantamount to the ownership of the entire surrounding country.

With this fact admitted, gentlemen can not better fortify against the lamentable consequences which were then so graphically portrayed than the adoption of the amendment under consideration. It is in keeping with that true political economy which is demanding public attention and fast asserting itself in this country by which a greater equality in the occupancy and ownership of the soil will be established and maintained. It will make it expedient and wise to repeal all land laws except the homestead law. It will encourage and foster agriculture, which, after all, is the basis of national prosperity.

For nearly twenty years I have been an actual observer of the superiority of irrigation over the present method of farming in the older States. I went to Montana when practically the only aspirants for the supremacy of the soil in that Territory were the sage-brush, the grease-wood, and the prickly pear. I saw these worthless growths disappear before the advancing irrigating ditch, and in their stead, as if by magic, sprang waving and prolific fields of wheat, oats, and barley. It has been said that "bread is the staff of life," but water in these arid regions is life itself. With it under his control and dominion the farmer does not have to contend against either a lack or excess of rainfall, but reaps his crops in their fullness with the regularity of the harvest.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment, I hope, is the harbinger of a new departure, the dawn of that glad day when the Government shall exercise supervision and control over the unappropriated waters in the arid regions and when only the homestead law shall be applied to our public domain. The voice and vote that promote this important legislation, legislation which makes it possible to multiply homes for the homeless and which encourages small holdings of real estate, will have done something to deserve the good opinions of the tillers of the soil and the toilers of the land; done something to vindicate what has come to be the deliberate judgment of mankind, namely, that the safety, conservatism, and perpetuity of our institutions are largely dependent upon that attachment to the soil which springs alone from small holdings of real estate.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in his remarks upon the bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma said something that deserves to be repeated here. I can not always agree with the gentleman from Indiana in his views respecting the public lands, but I give my unqualified indorsement to the following declarations of that gentleman:

There is no hope now, as all considerate men see, of preserving republican institutions with our ever rapidly increasing population swelling the multitudes of our cities with startling rapidity, unless the great body of the people are invested with an actual interest in the soil of their country. It is on the conservative power of these freeholds that our free institutions must rest. Therefore any measure that seeks to enlarge the number of freeholds is a measure of public safety and worthy of the highest consideration of the American Congress. Those freeholds, even if they are but a half or a quarter section of land, are better than fortifications and armed bulwarks for the support of free institutions and free government [applause]; and any measure of policy that will tend to diminish the number of these freeholds by an unwise appropriation of the public land still under national control ought not to be approved by Congress, while any measure that tends to enlarge their number ought to commend itself to us as the representatives of the American people.

These were brave and patriotic words fitly spoken, and ought to meet with a hearty response from every Representative in Congress, as I trust they will.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, Mr. TOOLE's time was, upon the request of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. SYMES, extended by unanimous consent for five minutes, not to come out of the four hours limited for debate on the pending amendment.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BAYNE, for the remainder of the week.

To Mr. CASWELL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I present the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word "forty" insert "thirty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
JOHN E. HUTTON,
Managers on the part of the House.
PHILETUS SAWYER,
C. K. DAVIS,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read:

Statement to accompany report of conference committee on House bill 7708.

This bill provides for an increase of the pension of Mrs. Annie Gibson Yates from twenty to thirty dollars. The Senate adopted an amendment increasing the pension from thirty to forty dollars. The conference committee has agreed to $35, so that the effect of the conference report increases the pension from twenty to thirty-five dollars.

JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
For managers on part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CANNON FOR ILLINOIS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6105) donating a 6-pound brass cannon to the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home. This bill has been favorably considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate a 6-pound brass cannon to the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out after the word "donate" the word "a" and insert "two."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will give us some explanation of this bill. I do not remember any instance in which the Government has given away brass cannon; it has been in the habit of donating cannon which were condemned and worthless.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. The worthless and condemned cannon to which the gentleman refers have been given away for different purposes from that contemplated in this bill. These cannon are intended to be used for the purpose of firing salutes at the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home. Under the general law all the national soldiers' homes have cannon for such purposes.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The title of the bill was amended, as recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, so as to read: "A bill donating two 6-pound cannons to the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home."

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, according to order, adjourned.

He also (for Mr. INGALLS) introduced a bill (S. 3537) to increase the pension of Mrs. Virginia Gardner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. INGALLS) introduced a bill (S. 3538) granting a pension to Mary Saeger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 3539) to amend an act to detach the county of Audrain in the State of Missouri from the eastern and attach it to the western judicial district of said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 3540) granting a pension to Mary P. Myers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3541) for the relief of John B. Wiltberger, executor of the will of Charles Wiltberger, late of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3542) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. KENNA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senate proceeds to the Calendar, I wish to inquire of the Chair if any message or communication has been received by the President of the Senate from the President of the United States in response to the resolution of the Senate asking for any communication made by his direction to the Government of Great Britain in regard to unfair discriminations against our citizens in the matter of tolls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No message has yet been received in reply to the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6105) donating two 6-pound brass cannons to the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

Mr. HARRIS and Mr. BLAIR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee. Does the Senator from New Hampshire rise to morning business?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not, but I understand the Calendar is in order and I wish to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee first addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6514, being Order of Business 2231, and being an appropriation to pay the claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury called the 4th of July claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senate proceeds to vote upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, having in view the Army nurses bill, which has been passed over without prejudice a great many times, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who has been waiting a great while for information from the War Department in order that the bill might be considered, whether he is prepared to go on with that bill this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not. I have not received the information. I have been assured by the Department that they are preparing it just as rapidly as it could well be done. It is a difficult matter to get at the exact information in regard to the nurses in consequence of the number of rolls upon which the names appear. The information is being prepared, and I hope it will be ready this week, anyway.

Mr. BLAIR. I ought to say, perhaps, that while the Senator may be quite careful as to the extent and minutiæ of the information which he is endeavoring to secure (which I do not consider of importance in reference to disposing of the bill, because the bill must be disposed of upon the merits of the cases rather than their number), still I understand the Senator is co-operating with a view to an early disposal of the bill, and I take the delay to be in no unfriendly spirit to its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. The object is to get the classes of employés who were in that position so as to distinguish between the cooks and the various classes and the nurses.

Mr. BLAIR. As I understand the Senator, we can hope that the powers of the Government will be sufficient to give us that information during this week?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think so.

Mr. BLAIR. The war power is a great power, and I hope it will be able to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6514) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, after line 1085 to insert in the list of claims from the State of Missouri provided for in the bill:

To Elkanah Grace, administrator of James Grace, deceased, Vernon County, $48.21.

Mr. SPOONER. This item of $48.21 was included in the letter of the Secretary and I understand it was in the bill when it was introduced, but it was omitted by mistake of the printer. So it should be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to insert, after line 1372, a new paragraph, as follows:

To John R. Reynolds the sum of $35,996, and to the personal representatives of James M. Reynolds the sum of $35,996, the same to be accepted in full payment, satisfaction, and discharge of all claims of the said John R. Reynolds and James M. Reynolds upon and against the United States for property sold to or taken and used by the United States Army during the war by or from said parties or either of them in the State of Mississippi.

I understand that the matter has been very fully examined by the Committee on Claims, and I leave it to the chairman of the committee to make any explanation desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; I supposed the Senator from Wisconsin had the amendment and would offer it.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I understood that the Senator from Missouri would offer it.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 4, after the words "to pay," I move to strike out the word "upon" and insert "in such manner as he shall direct, and without;" and in line 5, after the words "Secretary of War," to insert "and;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, in such manner as he shall direct and without the requisition of the Secretary of War, and without further audit, allowance, or restatement of the claims by the accounting officers, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. I am satisfied with the amendment. I think it should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to make a motion before that is acted upon. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill has just been passed, and upon that motion I desire to say a few words to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first state the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator vote in the affirmative?

Mr. BLAIR. I did, audibly, on purpose that I might make this motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senate will observe, or at least I have observed, that the consideration of this bill commenced at a trifle after half past 12, and that it was passed at a quarter to 1, the moment or two that have elapsed since a quarter to 1 having been occupied in the effort which I have made to get the floor on this motion to reconsider. It is a bill appropriating I do not know how much money.

Mr. SPOONER. One hundred and eight thousand dollars.

Mr. BLAIR. One hundred and eight thousand dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. Without the amendments.

Mr. BLAIR. That is nearly or quite four times the amount of money which has been saved to the country by the wrongful veto of the large number of special pension bills which have been vetoed during the last and the present Congress. It is three times at least the amount that was saved by the vetoing of bills, most of them unjustly vetoed, during the last Congress. Let me state the number of cases or claims which have been thus passed as rapidly as it was possible for the Chief Clerk to read them, and he read with very great rapidity, and without a single interruption except to adopt a single amendment which had been made by the committee to the bill, which was the addition of a further claim, none of them receiving the slightest consideration, all of them having been rushed through with this heedless disregard, this wicked, almost impious and nefarious disregard of duty on the part of Congress, which has been properly stigmatized from other departments of the Government with reference to the passage of other bills. In fifteen minutes we find a bill comprising six hundred and eighty-six claims, each one of them properly the subject-matter of close, long-continued, and intense investigation on the part of committees and other agencies of the Government, thus passed, without the slightest attention, without any apparent justification, without any discussion whatever, without any interference on the part of the Presiding Officer, without a word being said by anybody on either side of the Chamber.

Thus this great robbery, this outrage upon the Treasury of the United States, has been perpetrated by the Senate in the course of the last fifteen minutes without a word of objection or a word of criticism even from the most fastidious, not even from the Democratic side of the Chamber. In fact, the bill was introduced, it was championed, it was brought before us, it was called up this morning in the eye of other and very pressing business, and forced through. It was not forced through; it went through of itself, on account of this dereliction of duty on the part of us all, and it is now a law of the land so far as Congress can make it a law, but for the motion to reconsider which I have submitted, and which, as soon as I am done my remarks, if nobody cares to speak further upon the motion, I propose to withdraw.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not withdraw the motion. I should like to say a word or two.

Mr. BLAIR. No, I am not done. If any Senator wishes to speak upon it to justify this outrage upon the forms of legislation, I certainly have no objection. I notice that the Senator from Missouri finds in this bill claims to the number of ninety among his own constituents, and I have not a doubt that he may have something to say in justification of this wicked action on the part of the Senate, on account, it may be, of the justice of the claims of his own constituents.

But I am not undertaking to say that these claims are not all correct; I am simply calling attention to this gross carelessness, this wicked violation of the rules of proper procedure on the part of the Senate. I know it is wrong to make any allusion to another branch of the Government, or at least to the other legislative branch of the Government, but since the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] not now in his seat made the supposed possession of information by the other House the reason for our action here in a way that led us all into considerable difficulty in the case of another bill, I may go so far as to call attention to the fact that this is a House bill; it came from the House of Representatives and is in our possession from the House, for it must have passed the House in order to get here. It so appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I do not know that there is any law against our reading the proceedings of the House in that RECORD, even though doing so may influence our minds. And yet as we all read the RECORD outside the sessions of the Senate, the influence brought to bear upon our minds by reason of the proceedings of the House I do not suppose anybody will object to.

This is a House bill, and as I was saying, having read the RECORD with some attention from time to time, I have never seen any indication of discussion even in the House upon this bill; and that is the negligence and the legislative villainy perpetrated on the Senate in regard to this bill by the other branch of Congress; and if it be not so in reference to this bill, nevertheless it is true and has been true every year I have been in Congress, I think, in reference to similar bills.

This is what is called the 4th of July bill, I believe. The Senator from Tennessee has been kind enough to inform us that a great number of items of this description have come to us from time to time from the Committee on Claims. We find them incorporated in appropriation bills all the way through our legislation, and they are rushed through Congress in this same heedless, objectionable, bold, bad way, vastly worse than any of the acts granting special relief to the soldiers and the widows and mothers of soldiers of the Union of which we hear so much complaint. Why, in these fifteen minutes we have passed six hundred and eighty-six claims. Think of that! Six hundred and eighty-six, more than half the entire number of special pension claims which were passed during the whole of last Congress. Divide 686 by 15, and how many claims are passed in a minute?

If the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will be kind enough to inform me by a little example in division, I should be glad to know how much time we have given to the consideration of each of these claims this morning.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLAIR. Just a moment. What will be found by dividing the 686 claims by 15 minutes of time? And I have counted less than the actual number, I see, because in some instances I found after I got well through the bill half a dozen claims in a single paragraph, and in my count I counted each paragraph as one claim.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask if any of these claims have been duplicated? Have we passed any of them before that we are now passing again?

Mr. BLAIR. I can not say in regard to that.

Mr. VEST. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are several pension bills that have passed this body twice, and when they have gone to the President the second time he said he did not see any use in that mode of proceeding.

Mr. BLAIR. That is very good of him. And I notice that another bill went through the Committee on Commerce, of which the Senator from Missouri is a leading member, in which we appropriated for the harbor of a little one-horse village down in the State of Maine $25,000,000, and yet it became a law without the President signing it.

Mr. VEST. We had nothing to do with that. That was a mistake made by an officer of Congress, not by any member of that committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I would not undertake to screen the Committee on Pensions behind its clerks. There have been exceptions of that kind made many times, but the committee is responsible for its clerks, and we have got good clerks in the Committee on Pensions. They are mortal men, and the members of the committee are mortal men, and occasionally a mistake is made. I only allude to this mistake, which has not done a particle of harm, although the Committee on Commerce of both Houses of Congress and the President made this appropriation of $25,000,000 to improve the harbor at a place in Maine which would not perhaps bring $50,000 if bought outright.

I may be wrong in regard to that; but the appropriation was for the harbor of a little town where the appropriation designed was $25,000 only; but the mistake did no harm; and I call attention to the fact in regard to the pension cases to which the Senator from Missouri alludes where there happens to be a duplication of bills by some mistake in doing this vast amount of business. With bills cutting across each other, passing from one House to the other, sometimes it may be in the hurry and confusion of business that the same individual is provided a pension by two separate acts. But even then there is no harm done to the Treasury of the United States. The pension-roll is what the individual is paid upon, and if his name is on the roll by one act passed by a given Congress and after that another one has passed through both Houses and even may have been signed by the President, it does not result in a duplication of the tax upon the Treasury by any means.

As for the instances of such pension cases as the Senator refers to there have been but very few of them; indeed not more than six or eight. I have often called attention to the fact—and nobody has ever challenged it—that there has never been brought to the notice of Congress or of the country a single veto of a bill which was to give a pension where the local community knowing the applicant and knowing the case complained of the allowance of the pension. There are very great numbers of cases where those who have known of the case have exceedingly regretted and oftentimes with great emphasis have denounced the action of the Executive in vetoing those bills. I have stated here before and I state again that of all the cases which I have ever re-examined which were vetoed upon the merits, I have never found one which was not a good case, and which in my judgment, at least, should not have been allowed to become a law by the signature of the Executive.

I know the reports, I know the bills, I know the messages that come in from the Executive stating the facts altogether differently from what they had been found by Congress. I understand all that, and I know the zeal with which the press publishes to the country the Executive finding, which is simply that of a clerk at the Pension Office, who has been overruled in his former bad and sometimes malignant findings. But upon the facts as they exist, upon the evidence before Congress, I have never known the Executive to veto a single pension bill upon the merits, where in my judgment—and the judgment of Congress is but little behind what I say—the action of the Executive was not against justice, and did not constitute a wrong upon the party relieved by the action of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to another fact. I find that two hundred of the claims embraced in this bill are in the State of Tennessee. The Senator who represents and who has charge of this bill is the honorable and distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, the Senator from Tennessee took charge of it yesterday morning; the Senator from Tennessee moved its consideration this morning; and as his State has two hundred cases in this bill, while no other State has over one hundred, and that is the State of Kentucky, I assumed that the Senator from Tennessee felt more interest in the passage of this bill perhaps than he has in some of the pension bills which have been vetoed by the Executive. He knows the justice of these claims, and he presses them accordingly.

But I am not finding fault with the action of the Committee on Claims that reported this bill. Behind all this is the careful consideration of this committee that has been over the testimony, that has examined these cases fully; and these cases have all had a precedent examination by an executive officer of the Government, testimony has been collected, it has been considered, ex parte to be sure, and the question of loyalty often arising and very serious questions as to whether these claims should be allowed: first, as to whether they ever existed, and, second, whether the parties who preferred them were entitled to recover, even if they did exist. All this has been investigated.

But the point I make is that there is no stronger presumption of their sound and appropriate adjudication than there is in regard to every pension case which the President has vetoed, and there probably has not been so full, accurate, and careful an examination. I doubt whether a committee of Congress has looked over the evidence in these cases. I doubt whether it has done anything more than to make the most perfunctory examination. These cases come reported by an executive officer, who may be a very obscure man, and yet he may be a very sensible and discreet and able and judicious man.

A Senator suggests that perhaps they are relying upon the President to look up the testimony in these cases. If so, their reliance has been a vain one. For the last three years nobody has ever heard of his examining these cases at all. Here is an opportunity to save to the exchequer of the country many times more than the amount of money saved by what have been styled his brutal vetoes in the cases of pensioners. Why does he not look into these matters? Is there any claim that he sends these claims back to the executive officer who reports them to Congress in the first place? We have done all this in fifteen minutes, and we have done greater wrongs in every Congress all the while, under Republican as well as under Democratic administrations.

Now, Mr. President, let me read the number of these claims and their locality, and I do not claim to be accurate to a single number, because this did not occur to me as an outrage until the clerk commenced reading the bill and got about half-way through it, when the feeling of the solemnity of the occasion coming over me, gradually setting me all in a tremble, and perhaps possibly to some extent depriving me of the natural and full use of my powers, I may have made a mistake of a few in my count, but I did the best I could. I find that the honorable Senator from Tennessee, or the State he more particularly represents, has in this bill two hundred claims. They vary in amount. I observe one of $600, others of a smaller amount, and in another place I notice a claim of over a thousand dollars, and there may be—I can not say how large the largest or how small the smallest; can the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] tell me, or has he left the matter pretty much to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]?

Mr. SPOONER. I would not undertake to remember every item in the bill exactly.

Mr. BLAIR. I thought the Senator might be able to tell us.

Mr. SPOONER. One is as low as $48.

Mr. BLAIR. There are some as low as $12. Perhaps I am more familiar with the bill than the chairman of the committee. I notice one is for $1,094. So these amounts are not all so contemptible as they might be by any means. The average pension is $8 a month, and twelve times eight are $96. That is the annual amount involved in the average of the vetoed pension claims, you will observe, and here is a single claim which I notice for a larger amount than $1,000, passed right through in the same heedless way, in violation of the rules of propriety and legislative decorum, and carelessly, not to say in fraud and collusion and demagogy—I think that is the right word. I refer Senators to the veto messages for the proper language by which to stigmatize the action of the Senate and House on these matters.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is not aware that nearly, if not all, the two hundred claims from Tennessee are from Eastern Tennessee, which was on the Union side during the war?

Mr. BLAIR. I am glad to hear it. There is a presumption in their favor, then. Most of the Union soldiers were Union men during the war.

Mr. PAYNE. The people of East Tennessee were loyal.

Mr. BLAIR. But would the Senator claim that the presumption in favor of Union claimants under this bill in Eastern Tennessee is any stronger than the presumption in favor of the Union man who was in the Army and was wounded in the service of his country during the war, and yet whose bill has been vetoed in so many instances?

Mr. PAYNE. The Senator spoke of the "brutal" action of the President of the United States in vetoing pension bills. He has the right, and it is his constitutional right and duty to veto a bill of any kind which he does not deem proper. I regard that as very improper language.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, Mr. President, I will withdraw the word "brutal." I used the word "brutal" in this way: I said, "what so many have styled the brutal vetoes." I do not know but that may be an indirect indorsement of the term employed, on my own part. It seems that the Senator did not quite understand the language which I used. For fear somebody else will accuse me of using really bad words about these vetoes I will withdraw that word.

Mr. PAYNE. The Senator from New Hampshire ought to know that all of the claims provided for in this bill have been examined by the officers of the War Department, the Quartermaster-General, and the Commissary-General, who have found them to be just and have recommended that payment be made, and the Committee on Claims of the Senate has examined every one of these claims.

Mr. BLAIR. And no bill for a pension to any Union soldier by special act has gone to the President which had not been examined by the Committee on Pensions of the House, and by the House, and by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, and by the Senate, and allowed from the pressure of the sense of justice which was in most instances fairly burdened by the pressing weight of the testimony in favor of those claims. They have been vetoed, and yet that was a constitutional right. I admit it was a constitutional right. I am not complaining of the exercise of any constitutional right. What I am complaining of is not of the Executive, but of Congress for passing these bills in this hurried and heedless and utterly improvident and improper manner, and I want to know why it is that the Executive, since bill after bill of just this description has during every session of Congress since he has occupied the Executive chair been sent to him, has not interposed.

Congresses that have preceded this have passed these bills in this way and Executives have signed them, and nobody has ever before undertaken to criticise the wicked conduct either of Congress or the Executive. That is what troubles me, why this bill should not be vetoed, why this whole thing should not be overruled, and why the President, now that I call his attention officially by these words in debate to this gross imposition upon the forms of legislation and this probable outrage upon the Treasury of the country—I say I do not see why the President should not veto this bill, although it might deprive two hundred honest Union claimants of their money down in the State of Tennessee. It seems to me that he ought to do it, or else this nonsensical and abusive and outrageous talk that has been made in the vetoes and in the criticisms of Senators on this floor and in the press of the country, upon Congress for passing pension bills ought to be stopped and apologized for, one of the two. That is all I wish to say in that regard.

I was diverted from my point in giving the location of these claimants. The Senator from Tennessee, as I said, represents two hundred of them; the loyal State of Kentucky has one hundred more, West Virginia twenty-nine, Missouri ninety, Indiana twenty-three, Ohio fifty-nine, Maryland twenty, Pennsylvania thirteen, Kansas five, and the District of Columbia one, making a total of five hundred and forty according to my count, but which I think would, if I had time to count each individual case, for there are sometimes several contained in one paragraph, make more than seven hundred.

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say beyond calling attention—and I like to call the attention of the country to this matter in connection with the criticisms that have been passed upon the action of Congress in the enactment of special pension bills—to the fact that in the last Congress we did not undertake to pass through the two Houses more than about one-fifth of the bills that were introduced and referred, as I remember. So careful was the examination that the larger proportion of the bills were rejected, and many of them, as I think, improperly. We brought only to the consideration of the Senate from the Senate Committee on Pensions a little over a thousand bills, and we only brought them here after very careful and close scrutiny upon their merits. The Executive, after having apparently vetoed all that he could find an excuse for vetoing, approved about five-sixths of the bills passed.

The Senate will remember how we pass these pension bills always. If the action of Congress was thus heedless, thus inattentive, thus deserving of reprimand, how does it happen that this Executive approves and sanctions five-sixths of them, after all; and whoever examines the cases which he has approved and the cases which he has vetoed will find—I assert it from a re-examination of them—that he vetoes oftentimes very much better cases than he approves. I call attention to these points in connection with the alleged inaccuracy and improvidence on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. How many bills has the President vetoed?

Mr. BLAIR. The last account was two hundred and eighteen, I think. I see in the papers that eight more have been vetoed within a few days and sent to the other House.

Mr. PAYNE. How many have been passed by Congress over the President's veto?

Mr. BLAIR. Not one, I think. It takes a two-thirds vote to pass a bill over a veto, and every time you discuss one of these you put an end to twenty and it may be one hundred other just claims. I have learned a lesson or two. I find no fault longer with the Executive or with bureau officers for their action. I did that formerly. I uttered some criticisms which I thought were just; but I discovered that it is better for the great mass of those whose claims are yet unacted upon that you keep as quiet as possible. You get nothing whatever by undertaking to pass over an Executive veto any case, no matter how great may have been the wrong which was perpetrated by the veto itself.

After discussion in the last Congress of one bill, which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] thought was a very exceptional bill—no more just than a hundred others that had been vetoed—and by the committee consenting to keep silence while he put the case to the Senate and to the country in a way which blamed the Senate committee when they were not justly to blame, as I felt at the time, at least, he did succeed by an eloquent, urgent appeal to the Senate in passing one of those bills over the veto, and it went to the House; but it stopped in the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Were there any bills that were passed over the veto?

Mr. BLAIR. There may have been one that went through, perhaps one where it was found that it was good policy or on some allegation of new circumstances, to let that bill become a law. I do not know how that was; but, as a rule, those who have been interested for the allowance of these special acts know that the more quiet you can keep the better you endure your buffeting, the better it is for the great mass of those whose claims are yet undecided.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he can point to a single claim in all this list that is not a just and honest claim against the Government?

Mr. BLAIR. In this bill?

Mr. PASCO. In this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not believe there is one, and I do not believe there has been a single special act granting pensions vetoed by the President which upon the merits was not a just bill.

Mr. PASCO. I am not talking about pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I am.

Mr. PASCO. But as a member of the Committee on Claims I shall be thankful to the Senator from New Hampshire if he will point out a single claim in this list which is not a just, honest, and valid claim against the Government. If he will, I shall move to amend the bill by striking it out.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not believe there is one. I think no wrong has been perpetrated. I only call attention to the analogy between the method in which this business has been done and the method in which the special pension acts have been passed by Congress, and to the fact that while these bills go through, these Southern bills especially, as they all go through without criticism from any quarter whatever, and in the universal belief in their justice and upon a degree of investigation which does not in any wise compare with the thoroughness of investigation in the cases of the vetoed pension claims—I call attention to the fact that while these bills go through in this way and nobody finds any fault, yet the manner in which, after full consideration, the reading of every bill, attention being called to every bill specifically, we pass the pension acts without objection, or, if with objection, after debate; and yet Congress is held up almost to the execration of the country for the improvident and improper manner in which it transacts its business touching the special pension acts.

I think that is a point which ought to fix itself in the minds of Senators and in the minds of Congressmen and in the minds of the country, that on the whole subject of pension claims and these claims for losses by men of the South, the rule which is applied in the one case of charity, at least of admitted justice in their adjudication, should with equal liberality at least be extended to claims of the wounded and disabled soldiers of the Union and their dependent relatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am glad that this night-mare has seized the Senator from New Hampshire in the daytime and not in his sleeping moments. I confess my great astonishment that he should undertake to institute a comparison between the passage of this bill containing, say, seven hundred items, and the passage of seven hundred independent pension bills. He refers to these claims as "Southern claims." Mr. President, the Senator has spoken in utter disregard of the law and the facts. These seven hundred claims are what we generally call "4th of July claims." Why? Because the law which authorized their adjustment was approved July 4, 1864, and all the claims adjudicated under that law have been since called the "4th of July claims."

That law applied only to the non-insurrectionary States. It did not affect a solitary claim in an insurrectionary State. The claims for quartermaster stores and commissary supplies which originated in the insurrectionary States during the war were passed upon by the Southern Claims Commission as it is commonly called, or the commissioners of claims. That commission was organized under the act of 1871 in an appropriation bill, and all claims of loyal men residing in the insurrectionary States for quartermaster stores and commissary supplies were required to be presented to that commission, and the law of July 4, 1864, which gave the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence jurisdiction of the claims of loyal citizens in non-insurrectionary States, excluded from their jurisdiction and consideration any claim originating in the Southern States or the insurrectionary States. This law, therefore, applied only to loyal citizens of non-insurrectionary or loyal States.

Mr. BLAIR. Do not the claimants have to prove their loyalty?

Mr. COCKRELL. They have to prove their loyalty.

Mr. BLAIR. Is not that, then, a subject of investigation requiring proof?

Mr. COCKRELL. They have to prove their loyalty.

Mr. BLAIR. That is what I say.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; but the act of July 4, 1864, is only applicable to the claims of loyal citizens of loyal States.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not say they were not loyal.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why did you use the term "Southern claims?"

Mr. BLAIR. Is not Missouri a Southern State?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; Missouri is a loyal State.

Mr. BLAIR. Is not Tennessee a Southern State?

Mr. COCKRELL. Part of Tennessee was loyal.

Mr. BLAIR. Are not Southern States loyal States?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain that.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to hear the explanation.

Mr. COCKRELL. The non-insurrectionary States were never declared to be in insurrection.

Mr. BLAIR. Was Tennessee a non-insurrectionary State?

Mr. COCKRELL. The part of Tennessee from which these claims come was non-insurrectionary, and was expressly declared so by law and with the President's approval.

Mr. BLAIR. You mean East Tennessee.

Mr. COCKRELL. None of these claims were in an insurrectionary part of Tennessee; not one.

Mr. BLAIR. There was no insurrection in East Tennessee?

Mr. COCKRELL. There was insurrection in Tennessee; there was insurrection in Virginia, but none in Missouri, none in West Virginia, none in Maryland, and none in Kentucky. They were non-insurrectionary States. Portions of Tennessee were in insurrection, but not the whole of the State. A loyal Congress and a loyal President, Mr. Lincoln, declared what portions of Tennessee should be taken out of the condition of insurrection or disloyalty and placed in that of loyalty and non-insurrection during the war.

Mr. BLAIR. During the war and before subjugation?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Lincoln declared what portions of Tennessee were non-insurrectionary, and all these claims originated after that time.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will allow me a word?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not understand that the Senator from New Hampshire challenged the justice of any item in this bill or intimated that there is an item in this bill which has not received careful and thorough investigation, or to allege any reason why this bill should not become a law.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly not. On the contrary, I averred that I believed that every claim here provided for was a just claim even if it be a Southern claim, and I do not look on a claim from the South as necessarily a claim of a disloyal person, or on any human being, whether in the insurrection or not, as less loyal to-day than those who never were engaged in insurrection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I understand the Senator perfectly. I think I understand his insinuations. I think I understand what he wants the country to understand. I understand him perfectly.

Mr. SPOONER. The remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire were ironical so far as they related to this bill and the length of time taken by the Senate to pass it. I desire to have placed on record the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire that he did not challenge the justice of the items in this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. He challenged the action of the Senate in passing it, and then made these insinuations. He said that the Senate had passed this bill in fifteen minutes, containing seven hundred claims, and that he compared with the action of the Senate in passing seven hundred independent, separate bills, each one of which had to be read, instead of one line as in this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the Senator's argument to be simply this, that there was no more ground for impeaching the justice of these claims because of the short time it had taken the Senate to act on this bill than there was ground for impeaching the justice of pension bills because the Senate passes them rapidly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose the RECORD will show what the Senator said.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Reporter has gotten it right, for I never touch my remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nor I. I do not correct my remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. Sometimes he gets it wrong, however. I notice sometimes he leaves out the word "not" when I put one in, and the other day, if you will allow me, I was made to use the word "conniving" with reference to the action of this side of the Senate, when a motion was made by the Senator from Mississippi in regard to the reference of that Chinese bill, when I said "contriving." I want to say to the Senator that in leaving ourselves wholly to the mercy of the Reporter we may sometimes go down to posterity very differently from what we ought to do.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no comparison between the time taken up in considering this bill and the time that should be taken up in considering it, and the time that should be taken up in the consideration of any independent pension bill or any independent separate bill.

I stated that these claims originated under the law of July 4, 1864, in the non-insurrectionary States, and that law authorizes the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence to receive, consider, and pass upon the claims of loyal citizens in those States for commissary supplies and quartermaster stores taken and used by the Union Army during the rebellion.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. Is he not after all putting rather a superficial view of this subject to the country? These are claims resulting out of actual war where men furnished supplies to the armies that were doing their fighting on the soil where the parties lived. That is so, is it not? And if the war was an effort to suppress an insurrection, is it not rather sticking in the bark, to use a common expression, to try to make a point on me in using the expression "Southern claims?" These parties have to prove their loyalty. That would seem to imply that possibly the claim arose from parties living where there was a condition of rampant disloyalty which was being contended with.

Mr. COCKRELL. These claims originated, as I stated, in non-insurrectionary territory, and the law expressly provided that the claimant should present his claim to the Commissary-General of Subsistence or the Quartermaster-General and should prove his loyalty. That was the first requisite. Therefore there is no suspicious claim here; no Southern claim here. Then, in the second place, he had to prove that the supplies were actually taken and used by the Army for Army purposes and not as trespassing; not for individual use; not for personal gain, but they had to be used by the Army for the same purposes that the United States furnished to the Army quartermaster stores and commissary supplies; and the theory upon which the United States recognizes liability for these articles taken and used by the Army was that it was the duty of the Government to furnish our troops in the field with the quartermaster stores and commissary supplies necessary and allowed for their subsistence; and when they could not be furnished by the Government, the officers and the soldiers took them, and therefore the United States recognize liability for them, and they only recognize liability for such stores and supplies as it was the duty of the Government to furnish.

These claims were passed upon first by the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. We have appropriated thousands of dollars to appoint special agents under the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, who have gone into the field and have gone to the locality of the origin of every one of these claims and made a personal investigation, and every solitary agent that has been making these investigations was appointed under a Republican administration. The Quartermaster-General, General Holabird, is still the Quartermaster-General who is acting upon them. These agents go into the locality of each claimant and make an investigation and a special report, and after the Quartermaster-General or Commissary-General has received that report he passes upon the claim. That is not conclusive; that is not final. He then transmits the claim with all the papers and his decision to the Third Auditor of the Treasury. The Third Auditor of the Treasury then examines the claim and passes upon it anew. He has rejected hundreds and thousands of claims that the Quartermaster-General had reported favorably, and has allowed some that the Quartermaster-General had reported adversely upon.

That does not conclude the investigation. The claims are then sent to the Second Comptroller, and the Second Comptroller makes another investigation, which is the third investigation and third auditing of these claims; and after he has passed upon them he then reports them to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under the law the Secretary of the Treasury transmits a report at the beginning of each session of Congress to the House of Representatives, giving a list of all the claims so allowed since the making of the last report.

These reports began under the law in 1874. Prior to that time the allowances were paid directly by the Treasury; but in 1874 Congress passed a law requiring all these claims to be reported to Congress, and each year since 1874 the Secretary of the Treasury has made an annual report to Congress, giving the list of the claims and the amount allowed. That goes to the House of Representatives and goes to the committee there. They make an investigation; they act upon it; they report it to the House; it is passed by the House and it comes to the Senate. The bills have all gone here to the Committee on Claims. They are there considered in the Committee on Claims and reported back to the Senate and passed.

We see what investigation these claims have undergone, every one of them, and they are all of one class, all of one kind. Now, the Senator undertakes to make a great deal of noise about Congress passing a bill of this kind in fifteen minutes, and undertakes to criticise the President for vetoing pension bills that were passed at the rate of one hundred and twenty, I believe, in an hour, or something of that kind—I do not remember what it was.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to say that I have figured it out. These claims are passed at the rate of one in a second and two-sevenths.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is mathematical. The Senator only shows his want of attention—I will not say ignorance—to the business of the Senate.

The Senator makes a mare's nest over the passage of a bill here making appropriation for, say, seven hundred individuals, after each one of these claims has been investigated in the manner I have indicated, passed upon by the Quartermaster-General, then repassed upon by the Third Auditor, then repassed upon by the Second Comptroller, then submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives, and passed by the House, sent to the Senate, and passed upon by the Senate.

This is nothing. Talk about passing a bill with seven hundred items in it in fifteen minutes. The Senate, and the Senator is a party to it, has passed a bill every year ever since 1874 with sometimes ten thousand claims in almost ten lines, and yet he has said nothing about that. I hold in my hand now, as I happened to pick it up, having it here on my desk——

Mr. BLAIR. Did the President sign all those bills?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; all the Presidents have been signing them.

Mr. BLAIR. That is what I thought.

Mr. COCKRELL. I happen to hold in my hand—I did not get it for this purpose but for another purpose—House Executive Document No. 70, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, being "List of claims allowed by accounting officers of the Treasury." Here is a document of two hundred and seventy-six pages, all the pages one after the other filled with the names of claimants and the amounts allowed them. I will commence with the War Department. They commence:

No. of certificate or claim.	Name of claimant.	Appropriation from which payable.	Fiscal year in which the expenditure was incurred.	Amount.
	WAR DEPARTMENT.
	Claims.
6615	.....	.....	.....	.....

There follow the claims in regular successive order. The first claim is "Henry C. Pratt," "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1883 and prior years, 1882." Under that heading of "Pay, etc., of the Army, 1883 and prior years," there are ten full pages of names, each name occupying one line. The second one we come to is "Pay of two and three years' volunteers, 1871 and prior years." That occupies some twenty-odd pages of names.

I then come to a third class:

Bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs, 1871 and prior years.

There is a large list of claims.

Then we go on to various others. Here is another class of claims:

Commutation of rations to prisoners of war in rebel States and soldiers on furlough prior to July 1, 1883 (14 Stats., 364 and 422; also deficiency appropriation, act March 3, 1885).

Then here is another class of claims:

Horses and other property lost in the military service prior to July 1, 1883 (sections 3482-3487, Revised Statutes)—

A large number of them.

Then here comes another list of thousands of claims for "compensation of postmasters readjusted under act of March 3, 1883, payable from deficiency in postal revenues, 1883, and prior years." That covers over one hundred pages of this document.

All these claims were appropriated for and paid under simply a clause referring to the Executive Document and stating that the claims audited and reported in Executive Document No. so and so, under a certain heading, and the gross sum is appropriated for them. Why, Mr. President, was this gross sum appropriated in these cases? Is that act to be compared with the passage of a separate, independent bill, which had only received action in the Senate and House with the laborious duties imposed upon Representatives and Senators in addition to the consideration of private legislation?

Mr. President, the claims for arrears of pay and bounty in the Army are passed upon by the Second Auditor; they then go to the Second Comptroller; they are passed upon by him, and then they are reported to Congress. They go through two auditings. So it is with the claims for commutation of rations; so it is with claims for horses lost in the service; they are adjudicated first by the Third Auditor, they then go to the Second Comptroller, and so they are audited twice.

Does the Senator from New Hampshire undertake to say that the passage of a bill of that kind or the passage of a law providing for the payment of the claims under the act of July 4, 1864, that has just passed, is to be compared with the passage of so many independent separate pension bills?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will my friend from Missouri permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I would like to call attention to one thing that seems to have escaped the vigilance of the Senator from New Hampshire. The cases in this bill have been thoroughly examined and have been recommended favorably by the accounting officers of the Government, whereas the other class of cases to which the Senator referred have been examined by the officers of the Government and have been rejected.

Mr. BLAIR. Not in all cases. However, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator who has the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say there is no comparison. These claims have been acted on by officers whose duty it is to act upon them. They have been stamped and restamped, they have been audited and reaudited, and after that they have been passed upon by the House of Representatives and then sent to the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. The comparison the Senator attempts to draw is between the pension bills and this bill having the class of cases to which I have referred, that have been examined and approved by the officers of the Government.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the Senator said that there are many hundred claims in that single volume which he holds in his hand.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not figure them up. The Senator from New Hampshire can figure them up at his leisure. There are 276 pages and I suppose there are from fifteen to twenty-five cases on each page; I do not know how many.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator, who has served upon the Committee on Claims, whether those claims that he now speaks of were sent to his committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. BLAIR. They went simply to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. To the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAIR. And they were passed without any examination by that committee or examination by Congress at all?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator sees what the document is that is presented here.

Mr. BLAIR. But did not the Senator read the evidence in support of the claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, nor anybody else.

Mr. BLAIR. Nor any member of either House of Congress?

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the President of the United States has sanctioned these claims without any investigation whatever on the part of Congress, and left it to these unknown accounting officers. Who knows what fraud the country may have been submitted to. The Senator has made my case stronger, so much stronger by what he has said that I really have no occasion to talk about it at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator may say that it has made his case stronger. Congress has never investigated these cases, claim by claim, and could not if its members lived to be as old as Methuselah.

Mr. BLAIR. No Committee on Pensions ever imposed on the Senate of the United States by reporting a case that had not been investigated by it, and investigated pretty thoroughly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Appropriations never imposed on the Senate either by reporting these cases.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has found a great deal of fault with any criticism of this majestic, all-powerful, all-wise, and omnipotent Committee on Appropriations. I did not expect to catch that committee in a thing like this.

Mr. COCKRELL. Prior to 1874 these claims were all paid by the respective officers of the Government. A Republican Congress, by an act passed in 1874, declared that it was a better policy to require the accounting officers, although they were Republican, to report all these claims to Congress. Since then all these claims for pay, and for bounty, and for horses lost in the service have been reported to Congress. They have gone through the auditing process I speak of. If ever a committee of Congress undertook to go through the claims allowed for pay and bounty and lost horses I have never heard of it.

Mr. BLAIR. This bill is the one on which the debate originated. Am I to understand that the Committee on Claims have never examined personally, individually, the testimony in regard to these claims?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator never understood anything of that kind from me, and I did not refer to them.

Mr. BLAIR. I know that the Senator did not refer to these, but is not this book that he has here entirely irrelevant to the subject-matter of the debate? I understood that he was telling us that these claims were adjudicated in the Departments, and I supposed we were to understand the same in regard to this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the items in this bill have all been examined?

Mr. COCKRELL. When the Senator takes his seat I shall answer his question.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the question, whether the original evidence in support of the claims in this bill has been examined by the members of the Committee on Claims before they reported the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. From the session of 1875 and 1876 to the 3d of March, 1881, I was a member of the Committee on Claims. During that time, at each session, a bill of the same purport as this, authorizing the payment of claims for quartermaster stores and commissary supplies came to that committee. We then divided the cases among the different Senators. I believe it was then the rule to refer about twenty cases to each Senator on the committee. All the papers—a whole car-load of papers in all these cases had been sent to the House of Representatives. I do not know what the rule of the Committee on Claims now is; but heretofore during the years that I was on it, those papers were sent to the Senate when the bill passed the House.

The chairman of the Committee on Claims would take, promiscuously, twenty or more of the claims and refer them to each one of the Senators, in order that he might make a thorough examination of those twenty cases as sample cases. We could then judge for ourselves of the accuracy, first, of the Quartermaster or Commissary General in his investigation and audit, and second, of the accuracy of the Third Auditor in his reinvestigation and audit, and third, of the Second Comptroller in his reinvestigation and re-reaudit; and if we found that number of claims correct, we then recommended the passage of the bill.

Occasionally we found inaccuracies, and those were corrected. I presume the Committee on Claims of the Senate now give the subject that consideration. I can not answer for it, but I presume the committee does. The House committee may have given it more. I do not know what the rule now is. That was the investigation that was given when I was a member of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLAIR. Particularly to these bills?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know about these bills specially; I have not been a member of the Committee on Claims since 1881.

Mr. BLAIR. That seems to strengthen my original position, that the claims in this bill undoubtedly are all just claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt of the justice of the claims, and they have received consideration. They have received consideration three times by proper officials before they have received action in the Senate or before they received action in the House.

Now, the Senator says this is great carelessness, this is negligence—that we are rushing through here seven hundred claims in fifteen minutes; and beyond that, he undertakes to criticise the President of the United States.

I will not repeat the language that the Senator applied to the President. It is common language to be applied to the Chief Executive now. I do not take offense at it. If gentlemen, Senators, can apply such epithets to the Chief Executive of the United States, they are welcome to do so. The Chief Executive of the United States is not harmed by the application of such epithets, he is not injured by the application of such epithets, he is not lowered in the estimation of the good people of the United States by the pouring of any such epithets on his head; he stands far above the reach of such malicious thrusts, far above the reach of such envenomed arrows. They fall harmless at his feet.

I would bid the Senator from New Hampshire and his colleagues go on, "lay on," "gnaw the file" to your heart's content. The President can stand it; the people of the United States can stand it; and the people of the United States will understand it and will know and appreciate the motives which inspire such charges and such attacks.

There is no comparison here at all, Mr. President. The Senator from New Hampshire is trying to sustain the passage of hundreds of pension bills hurriedly, each one of them a separate bill, each one of them depending upon a different state of facts and different questions of law.

Nine out of ten of them have been investigated by the proper executive department of the Government and have been rejected, have been "disallowed." The appeal is from the executive department to Congress to override the action of the duly constituted officers. And not only that, but a very large number of those bills that have been vetoed by the President were rejected by General W. W. Dudley, the Commissioner of Pensions, under a Republican administration, and a wounded and crippled soldier of our country.

When the Senate of the United States passes those bills and reverses the action of that executive officer, General Dudley, it is criticising him and criticising former Republican administrations. A large number of bills which have been passed and vetoed by the present Executive were claims disallowed while General Dudley was Commissioner of Pensions; and now the effort is being made to heap upon the President the responsibility for the disallowance of these claims, and to create the impression that those which were rejected were all rejected by the present Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. Who has undertaken to create such an impression as that?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the impression you want to go abroad to the country.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is not at liberty to say that I have tried to create that impression.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see what else to ascribe it to.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator must not attribute bad motives to me in order to cover his own obtuseness.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there was any object on earth except a thrust at the President and his party and the Executive Departments I fail to see it.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to tell the Senator that the Senate of the United States and the other branch of Congress are not in the condition of the aggressor in dealing with pension bills. The criticisms, and the insulting criticisms, began with the Executive, and when there is a little disposition to resent that impertinent and wholly unprecedented method of dealing with the legislative department of the Government, and it begins to hurt, because there is a sense of justice in the American people that may be appealed to, then the Senator and his coadjutors and his apologists lie down and whine under it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Lie down and whine under what?

Mr. BLAIR. Lie down and whine under it, and complain that they have been assaulted.

Mr. COCKRELL. We do not.

Mr. BLAIR. Anything that has ever been said in regard to these vetoes, so far as I know or have had anything to do with it, has been the simplest and long-withheld effort at self-defense on the part of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did I not tell you a moment ago to "lay on?" I will repeat it now: "Lay on."

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, but when there is a little laying on the Senator whines at it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do nothing of the sort.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not interrupt these quotations from Shakespeare.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let him interrupt it; it is no interruption.

Mr. SPOONER. The quotations from Shakespeare I alluded to.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, yes; excuse me. I should not have interrupted them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let him interrupt. We are not complaining; we are not whining. I say the President has done right. I say the insinuation that his messages were insulting or that they were brutal or unjust is without foundation. I hurl the aspersion back; but I say I am delighted to see you hurling such epithets at the President. It only shows the desperation of your position and your cause, when you can only benefit it by abuse and vilification, and making mouths at the President. That is what it results in; nothing less and nothing more.

We are asking no quarter on that ground; none at all, not a particle. The President has done his duty; he has done it manfully, he has done it bravely, he has done it fearlessly, and the people of this country will give him just credit for it. These insinuations and these speeches such as the Senator from New Hampshire has made this morning are simply for the purpose of trying to discredit the President before the country and to cast an aspersion on him and his motives, to justify the action which the Senator and his colleagues have taken in hurriedly passing hundreds and hundreds of pension bills through the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am supremely indifferent, as Tennessee is, to the scolding criticisms of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not propose to waste either time or words upon that. But I do propose to inform the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senate that the House has passed another bill making appropriations for the payment of a large number of claims very similar to these provided for in this bill—claims that have been regularly referred to and investigated by the Court of Claims, where both the Government and the claimant were represented, and where that tribunal has ascertained and declared the fact of the loyalty of the claimant, the fact of the taking, using, and consumption of the property of the citizens, and the fact of its value. That bill passed the House of Representatives in March last and was referred to the Committee on Claims of the Senate.

I rise more for the purpose of asking the chairman of that committee when I may hope that that bill may be reported to the Senate; and, when it is reported to the Senate, if somebody else does not, I will act in respect to that bill as I have done in respect to this because of the fact that a large number of exceedingly worthy and needy people of the State that I have the honor in part to represent are claimants and are justly entitled to their money. I am eagerly anxious to see that that bill shall pass at the earliest moment possible in order that they may receive what has been due them for more than a quarter of a century. I would be glad to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Claims as to when I may hope that the bill may be reported to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. At the outset, in replying to the question put to me by the Senator from Tennessee, I am willing to give him a certificate, if he desires it, for use among his constituents, that from the day the bill to which he alludes came from the House of Representatives up to this moment that Senator has not neglected the interests of his constituents who are named in the bill; but has, in season and out of season, brought that subject (politely always, of course) to the attention of the committee and its chairman, and has urged action upon it.

The bill to which the Senator from Tennessee alludes was referred by the Committee on Claims to its chairman for investigation and report. The bill appropriated, as it passed the House of Representatives, about $155,000. Amendments were offered to it in the Senate by various Senators, the amounts of which aggregate, I believe, about $384,000. At any rate, with the amendments and the original bill, the sum now involved is about $466,645.82. The House of Representatives passed the bill upon a report made by the Committee on War Claims. That report proceeded upon the theory, which possesses an element of strength beyond question, that the Government having created a tribunal of its own, before which it had invited its citizens having claims, it ought to be bound by the result of the investigation. Therefore every claim reported by the Court of Claims was passed by the House.

When the bill came into the Senate I examined it upon the theory that the assumption of the House report was correct, and to ascertain simply whether the findings of fact in each case, assuming them to be correct and supported abundantly by competent testimony, would warrant an appropriation. I found two or three claims which I thought did not, as found by the court, afford sufficient foundation for the appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will pardon the Chair. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, adding that if it takes fifteen minutes to dispose of this bill I will not insist on occupying the time of the Senate further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the unfinished business be informally laid aside to continue the consideration of the bill as to which the Senator from Wisconsin was addressing the Chair when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. As I was saying, I found a few cases which, even as found by the court, did not warrant an appropriation. Under the act of Congress it is entirely competent for Congress to disregard the findings of the court if it deems it wise to do so, because those findings do not constitute a judgment at all, but are simply findings of fact for the information of Congress, and are advisory only.

I brought to the attention of the committee those cases, and was authorized to strike them from the bill and then to report the bill. Before I could report the bill to the Senate, however, my attention was called to another claim, the findings of fact upon which were adequate, but I was led to examine the testimony upon which the findings were based. I found the record elaborate, and I went through it at great labor, and I think I state simply the fact when I say that no man in the Senate, and no intelligent man in the United States, would be content for one moment to submit to a judgment based upon such testimony as that which formed the basis of that finding against the Government of the United States. I could not report that claim favorably to the Senate.

Thereupon it became natural for me to investigate further the items in the bill and also the general subject. I found that forty-five thousand claims had been rejected under the 4th of July act by the Quartermaster's Department, and that about ten thousand claims had been rejected under the 4th of July act by the Commissary Department. I found that a vast number of claims had been rejected by the Southern Claims Commission. Those claims were rejected upon different grounds, some of them upon the ground that the claimants were disloyal, others, the loyalty of the claimant being established, upon the ground that the claims themselves were without merit.

I found that nearly every item of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and nearly every item embodied in amendments offered in the Senate to the bill were claims which had been acted upon under the law either by the Departments or by the Southern Claims Commission and had been rejected, some of them for want of loyalty, some of them for want of merit. I hunted up the reports of the Southern Claims Commission. They reported each claim rejected, with a synopsis of the testimony upon which they rejected it, giving in many cases the names of the witnesses and an abstract of the testimony. I examined a number, I think eight, of these claims involved in the amendments offered in the Senate in which the Southern Claims Commission had rejected the claims because of the disloyalty of the claimants. They are now before the committee upon finding by the Court of Claims that the claimants were loyal and attached to the Government of the United States during the rebellion.

I felt it to be my duty, after what had already transpired, and after ascertaining upon investigation in one case that the findings of fact were not, in my judgment, supported by the testimony, to compare the testimony as to loyalty upon which the Southern Claims Commission acted with the testimony as to loyalty upon which the Court of Claims found favorably the fact. I have before me some of the testimony, depositions, sometimes taken with cross-examination and sometimes with the cross-examination waived, and I think it absolutely inadequate for any tribunal to base the finding of loyalty upon, and the finding of loyalty is the jurisdictional fact, it will be remembered.

I do not intend to take the time of the Senate to call attention to the evidence specifically. I have examined eight of the cases. I am unwilling, and so far as I have submitted the matter to the Committee on Claims, notwithstanding the Court of Claims has found in favor of the loyalty of the claimants, they are unwilling to authorize a favorable report in those cases.

It will be seen that so far as we have gone and with the result, we can not report any of those cases without a careful examination of the testimony upon which each case is based. I have gone into that as far as I could, with other duties.

But I desire to call attention to the fact that that bill is the first of the omnibus bills, the avant-courier of an army of similar bills to follow, involving twelve or fifteen millions of dollars; I think I would be more nearly accurate if I said involving $20,000,000. Fourteen similar omnibus bills are now favorably reported, as I understand, by the committee of the House of Representatives and are upon the Calendar of that House awaiting action.

It will be seen by Senators that it behooves the Senate and its committee to act with great care in the examination and the report upon such bills. Under existing law it is an easy matter to invoke the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and that, too, without even the knowledge of claimants. At the last Congress 1,600 of these claims were referred by a committee of Congress to the Court of Claims. At this session of Congress 4,000 of these claims have been referred by the committee to the Court of Claims. All of the 45,000 rejected by the Quartermaster's Department——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not mean the committee of the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. I mean the committees of the House; I do not mean of the Senate. The Senate has referred very few. It will not be long until every one of the 45,000 claims rejected by the Quartermaster's Department and the 10,000 rejected by the Commissary Department, and the claims rejected by the Southern Claims Commission, will find their way by reference under the Bowman act to the Court of Claims.

I am told that a single lawyer, or claim agent, as he should be called, has secured the reference of six hundred or seven hundred of these claims to the Court of Claims. I am told that he found those claims in the list of the rejected cases. It is an easy matter to file petitions; it is an easy matter to have them referred; and having had them referred to the Court of Claims, I am told that he communicated with the claimants, who up to that time were utterly ignorant of the fact that their claims had been referred to the Court of Claims. The claims had years ago been rejected and the claimants had rested content with the action of the Department. He informed each claimant that he had had his case referred to the Court of Claims, where he would be pleased to prosecute it if he would pay him a half or quarter of what was recovered. I might say more in this direction, but will not now take the time of the Senate, although the matter is important to the people.

A great many Senators have received letters from claimants. Some have received letters from gentlemen whose claims are in the bill. A great many Senators have received letters from claimants whose claims are not in the bill. I have for some time been the object of special attention from a good many Senators. They have come to me frequently, stating that they had received requests from their constituents that the bill should be promptly reported, and many letters have been referred to me all couched in similar language.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. If it would not be too personal, I would inquire whether they were Northern Senators or Senators from the insurrectionary States.

Mr. SPOONER. I have had requests from Southern Senators and I have had requests from Northern Senators, and I will explain to the Senate in a moment how it has come about.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no doubt they came from all sections, of course.

Mr. SPOONER. It was not because the claims came from all sections; but I will explain that in a moment. Senators have come to me stating, of course accurately, that they had received, some of them telegrams, others letters from constituents claiming that they were interested in the bill and asking them to call upon the chairman of the committee and urge a prompt report upon the bill. I looked into the bill and found that a good many of the gentlemen who were writing these letters were not named in the bill; that they apparently had no interest in the bill, and I could not understand it until there came to me one day a circular which made it all clear as the sun-light. I desire to read it to the Senate, and I propose to read it to the Senate to show how the scheme is being worked up; what pressure is attempted to be brought from over this country upon the Committee on Claims to make haste in reporting the bill, and how it happens that a large number of these requests came from people who have no appropriations in the bill. It is a printed circular except in one or two places where the blanks are filled by writing. I shall not read the name of the gentleman to whom it is addressed, but it is some one who has a claim against the Government, I believe. The circular is as follows:

LAW OFFICE OF GEORGE A. KING, 1420 NEW YORK AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., August 20, 1888.

DEAR SIR: A number of claims for stores and supplies, similar to your claim which I have in charge, have been from time to time favorably reported by the Court of Claims to Congress, after a thorough examination by that court of the questions of loyalty and of the taking and use of the property by the Army. Up to this date, however, not a single one of these claims, so far as I am aware, has been paid. This is owing to the failure of Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose.

It must be obvious to you that it is useless to spend time and money in the prosecution of these claims if Congress is not going to fulfill its obligation to do justice to the citizen by making the necessary appropriations to pay claims favorably passed upon by the Court of Claims. It is therefore very important for you to do all you can by proper argument to induce Congress to appropriate for claims already allowed, as this will set the example and form a precedent for an appropriation to pay your claim when allowed, as I trust it will be, by the Court of Claims.

A bill passed the House of Representatives on the 9th of March last, for the payment of the first batch of these claims reported by the Court of Claims. It is numbered House bill 2952, and is entitled "An act for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act." This bill was received in the Senate on the 12th of March, 1888, over five months ago, and referred to the Committee on Claims. A number of amendments, embracing claims reported at later dates in the session by the Court of Claims, have also been introduced by various Senators, and have all been referred to the same committee. This committee has not yet reported back either the bill or the amendments to the Senate, nor can I learn when it intends to do so. The members of this committee are: Senator JOHN C. SPOONER, of Wisconsin, chairman; Senators GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts; JOHN H. MITCHELL, of Oregon; WILLIAM M. STEWART, of Nevada; MATTHEW S. QUAY, of Pennsylvania; JAMES K. JONES, of Arkansas; EPHRAIM K. WILSON, of Maryland; SAMUEL PASCO, of Florida; and CHARLES J. FAULKNER, of West Virginia.

I suggest to you that as a measure tending to the ultimate payment of your own claim—

Which is not in the bill at all—

it would be proper and highly advisable for you to address a letter to each of your Senators in Congress—

And then follows in writing the names of two Senators. This circular is made so that it is easily adapted to the situation of the claimant—

Hons. JOHN T. MORGAN and JAMES L. PUGH, and also to any of the above-named members of the committee that you may know, giving the title and number of the bill above mentioned (House bill 2952), and setting forth that, as a measure of justice to all claimants interested, said bill and the amendments thereto ought to be reported to the Senate for consideration at the earliest possible date, and asking them to request the committee and its chairman so to report them without further delay. In view of the lateness of the session you may find it well to telegraph these Senators, especially if you are at any telegraph station where night messages can be sent at half rates.

Please notify me of whatever action you take on this circular, and should you receive any answers from the Senators whom you address please send me such answers or copies thereof.

Truly yours,

GEORGE A. KING.

What other circulars of a similar kind have been sent out by other claim agents I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator a question, as I am not very familiar with these claims?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe the Senator stated that there were about forty-five thousand of these claims rejected by the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; and ten thousand were rejected by the Commissary Department.

Mr. HOAR. Saying nothing about those rejected by Congress itself.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the Senator familiar with the cases sufficiently to state whether, in the main, the cases which were rejected have been rejected on account of the disloyalty of the parties claiming?

Mr. SPOONER. I have read the reports in a goodly number of cases, and I find that in many cases the claims were rejected upon the ground of the disloyalty of the claimants, and in other cases on the ground that there was no justice in the claim.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to ask another question. Are any of the claims now being considered by Congress any portion of those which have been rejected by the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I stated at the outset that almost every item in the original bill and nearly every item covered by the amendments, amounting to three hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars, offered in the Senate, have heretofore been investigated by the Quartermaster's or other Department, or by the Southern Claims Commission, and rejected either because of the disloyalty of the claimants or because the claims were without merit.

Mr. CULLOM. I was not in at the time. When the claimants come to Congress I suppose the effort has been to prove that they were loyal?

Mr. SPOONER. The cases are presented to Congress by bills or petitions and referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, and in all these cases, in the bill and in the amendments, the Court of Claims——

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator refer to the pending bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no. The Department has found in all those cases the claimants to have been loyal. What I stated to the Senate was that I have gone behind the findings of fact by the Court of Claims in a number of cases, have examined the evidence upon which they predicated the finding of loyalty in a comparison with the testimony upon which the Department or the Southern Claims Commission rejected the claim upon the ground of disloyalty, and I find in the cases I have examined that the evidence is not sufficient to establish the loyalty of the claimants, or to overturn the adverse decisions heretofore made upon thorough investigation into the subject.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to ask one question further, which probably has already been answered, as I have not been present all the time. Have any of the claimants whose claims are provided for in the bill we are now about to vote upon been declared by the Quartermaster's Department to be disloyal to the country?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly not. All those claims were investigated by the Department, the claimants were found to be loyal, the claims were found to be just, were reported to the proper auditing officer of the Government for settlement, and reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress as allowed claims for payment. I am referring in what I state to another bill not yet reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him if he knows—I am informed and I suppose the statement to be true, but I do not know it certainly—that in the vast number of claims referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act that court has rejected over 80 per cent. of the claims that it has investigated? Is the Senator informed as to that fact?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know whether that be true or not. However that may be, the court has not rejected some claims which I think and which the committee think the court ought to have rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question, as his time seems to belong to the Senate at large and not to himself. Is it not true that under the Bowman act the Court of Claims can reject nothing under the clause of which he is speaking? The Court of Claims simply finds the facts and reports to Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will state that I was perhaps inaccurate in the use of that word. I intended to say that the Court of Claims failed to find the necessary facts to recommend payment of the claim.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator means the jurisdictional fact of loyalty.

Mr. HARRIS. Well, the jurisdictional fact of loyalty, or I suppose the question of merit even, where loyalty was established, would be a ground upon which the court would not recommend payment.

Mr. SPOONER. The court is to report the information to Congress, and they could report that they found the claimant loyal and that the claim was without merit. They do not recommend the payment of any claim.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to make a further inquiry. I understood the Senator to state a few moments ago that quite a number of bills in another place are on the Calendar or under consideration which would amount to a great many millions of dollars if the claims were allowed. Are those claims incorporated in such bills as we are now considering?

Mr. SPOONER. They are not incorporated in such bills as we are now considering. The question of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to which I am replying is not in relation to the bill which we are now considering, but in relation to another bill, an omnibus bill, so called, which is still before the committee.

I desired to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that there is an immense number of these claims, amounting to millions and millions of dollars, which under existing legislation are being referred to the Court of Claims, and we have come to the conclusion that we can safely pass no bill without an examination of the testimony upon which the finding is based; and we propose to take our time in the examination of that bill and similar bills. We do not intend that any one of them shall be reported to the Senate without careful investigation and without the judgment of the committee upon the testimony in each claim that the claimant was loyal and that the claim is just.

I desire to say, therefore, that these dragooning methods which have been adopted may as well, so far as the Committee on Claims is concerned, come to an end. Unless instructed by the Senate we shall proceed, as we have been proceeding, to examine upon its merits each case, and if we do not finish the examination until the next session the bill will not be reported until the next session. I desire that every claimant whose claim is fair and whose loyalty is unimpeachable shall be paid, and promptly paid, and every claim which is a fair claim we shall as speedily as possible report to the Senate.

I wish to say that in nothing I have said do I intend to be understood as reflecting in the slightest degree upon the Court of Claims. It is absolutely impossible, in my opinion, for that court to investigate these cases and to give to them the attention which it seems to me they demand in the interest of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course he is more familiar than I am with the mode of procedure before the Court of Claims. The Government I understand is represented before that court.

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that in a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the testimony taken ex parte or upon cross-examination?

Mr. SPOONER. In most of the cases I have examined it might as well have been taken ex parte.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know as to that fact.

Mr. SPOONER. I found a number of cases where I could find no fault with the representative of the Government, but it seemed to me to be perfectly palpable that there was a collusion in which the Government was powerless almost, with the means in the hands of the Department of Justice, to detect. It is not difficult for dishonest claimants to so combine. They can swear each other's cases through. Here are a dozen claimants in a community. Each must establish his loyalty, each must prove his case. They interchange testimony. Tom Jones testifies to the loyalty during the war of half a dozen other claimants, and when Mr. Jones's case is to go through the other claimants testify as to his loyalty.

Mr. BUTLER. Then practically the investigation of the Court of Claims is of no real value to Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. I will not say that; I think it is of value, but I was about to say——

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question, which will come in as pertinent to what was inquired by the Senator from South Carolina. Will he not state a little more fully to the Senate the advantage of the old investigation under the direction of the Department, or under the direction of the Southern Claims Commission in those cases, over a trial in the Court of Claims, by reason of the sending of agents to the neighborhood? I do not know but what the Senator may have stated that.

Mr. SPOONER. No, I did not state it, but it is what I was about to say. The investigation made by the Quartermaster's Department was made by an agent sent into the vicinity, a man who could hunt up the claimant, who could examine his neighbors as to his antecedents, who could find out whether he was loyal during the war or whether he was not, whether his loyalty began when the Union Army came into his vicinity or whether he had been loyal from the beginning.

Mr. HOAR. He saw the witnesses in person.

Mr. SPOONER. He saw the witnesses and could examine them and cross-examine them. It was so with the investigation made by the Southern Claims Commission. They had at their disposal agents, and I judge from the investigations some very intelligent and energetic agents, who went into the vicinity, into the neighborhood of every man who had a claim, and pursued a careful, thorough investigation.

It is not possible that the Court of Claims should make any such investigation. It is not its function. It is not the business of the court, and it can not be made the duty of the court, to hunt up evidence. The court must decide upon the evidence presented, and the collusions and the fraudulent combinations which produce testimony detrimental to the interests of the Government are not before the court. They pass upon the case as they find it. We have more discretion. We have more power as a committee, and the Senate has more power.

Another thing, I think that the Attorney-General's Department, from what I hear, is inadequately supplied with the necessary agents and assistants to attend to this business. There are only six attorneys representing that Department in that court. The business of the court has multiplied within the last three or four years beyond measure. The spoliation claims have gone up into the thousands. Several lawyers have been detailed to look after them. Every Department has the right under the Bowman act to refer questions of fact to the court for investigation and finding upon the facts, and in addition is what may properly be called the "general jurisdiction" of the court. It is not fair to the court to dump upon them these cases by the thousand, expecting satisfactory results under present methods, and with present facilities for investigation.

One of the attorneys who represents the Government (and I have been pleased with such of his work as I have examined in the way of briefs upon the question of loyalty and upon questions of fact) tells me the Department of Justice has no authority, no power to send out agents to investigate the facts in these cases. On the other hand, the principal attorneys of this class of claimants mostly come from the States in which the claims arise. They are familiar with the people in the locality. They go out and take testimony with the aid of the claimant and other claimants; but the attorney of the Government is at a great disadvantage.

On the question of loyalty the Government is at a disadvantage at best and of necessity. It is purely subjective. If a man did nothing either one way or the other it is impossible to contradict him if he swears he was loyal. If my friend from Alabama says he has the headache I must take it and we must all take it to be true. If a man says he was loyal, which is a mere sentiment of course, we can not contradict it or successfully dispute it if he did nothing to evidence his loyalty or to evidence his disloyalty; so that here, after the lapse of twenty-odd years, we have claimants by the thousand coming into the Court of Claims under an act of Congress making the finding of loyalty a jurisdictional fact, the claimant testifying that he was loyal, two or three of his neighbors testifying that he was loyal, and the court finding he was loyal. It is not satisfactory, but it is inevitable, and the situation demands radical treatment. The committee will in time endeavor to recommend such. In the mean time we wish to give notice to these claim agents that a favorable finding by the Court of Claims is not to be held by the Senate as equivalent to a judgment against the Government by any means.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no statute of limitations?

Mr. SPOONER. There is no statute of limitations as to the investigation under the Bowman act.

Mr. BUTLER. The court has the right, as I understand, to subpœna witnesses.

Mr. SPOONER. How will the court ascertain the witnesses?

Mr. BUTLER. The representative of the Government could ascertain them.

Mr. SPOONER. The representative of the Government is, as a rule, here in Washington. You can not send six lawyers representing the Department of Justice all over Tennessee and all over North Carolina and the other States to look personally into the different cases and hunt up witnesses.

I have only attempted to state sufficiently the facts and the difficulties to the Senate, to explain why the Committee on Claims is moving slowly in its action upon the bill as to which the Senator from Tennessee interrogated me, and to show that we must, among other things, in some way relieve the court and strengthen the Department of Justice by giving additional aid for protecting the interests of the Government.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I wish to occupy but a few moments.

Mr. STEWART. I must insist upon going on with the Chinese restriction bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to have a few moments, and I think under the circumstances I should be allowed to proceed. After the motion which I made with another view, which has developed matter of very great, of almost supreme importance to the Senate, I can not but feel that I have builded much more wisely than I knew in making the motion to reconsider. It may not be of great importance so far as this particular bill is concerned, which I understand has the indorsement, after careful scrutiny, of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], but it has opened before us an impending gulf which it would be well to scan before we leap into it.

I might perhaps be justified in alluding to the courtly manner in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] as well as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] waived all allusion to the trifling matters that I may have uttered during debate, upon the ground that the source they came from seemed to render them entirely a matter of indifference. I have become accustomed to the airs of the patricians in the Senate, and they trouble me less than ever before. So I think I am able to pass that by with a corresponding, if not a superior, degree of indifference to that which was manifested by those who indulged themselves therein.

Gradually, as this becomes a republican government and true republicanism prevails all over the country, we shall have a Senate of peers; the patricians and the plebs will be merged in one, and Senators from one section of the country, unless they are able to demonstrate that they have some superior ability to ground their airs upon, will be willing to associate with others in open Senate upon an equality. Until they demonstrate that native capacity to despise what others may say or do I shall certainly be indifferent to the demonstration of those who wear those honors at present.

Mr. President, I was criticised a little for having dropped inadvertently or purposely, as the case may be, severe expressions with reference to the conduct of the Executive, and I am informed that it is of no consequence that I withdraw them. It is a happy thing that it is of no consequence, because there would be no withdrawal under any circumstances. I will simply add, however, that giving to them their utmost pertinency and intensity of meaning, I still concede the universally admitted proposition that the President is better than his party; and there I leave that.

In regard to the fluttering that was evinced on the part of Senators who spoke in opposition to my original speech, if it were a speech, which was not designed to be uttered with the utmost gravity and solemnity all the way through, I will say to those who insisted upon making it a serious matter, as though I were controverting the justice of these claims, that I am moved to make a quotation myself. This is a quotation, the Senators will observe:

Conscience does make cowards of us all.

I had not assailed the justice of these claims. I had said nothing about the forty-five thousand other claims which are lying behind waiting, and a dozen bills embodying a great number of them, it seems, is already upon the Calendar of the Democratic House. I had said nothing about them. I had asserted what I supposed I could safely do, the justice of every claim that is contained in this bill. Yet Senators rose, the Senator from Missouri notably, and demonstrated that the Government had done a great deal worse in other instances in the way of its carelessness in appropriation than in the instance before us.

They seemed to be apprehensive that just what the Senator from Wisconsin has been moved to say would be developed in this debate, and that this ocean of discredited, of false, wicked claims, as it seems, so far as the previous action of the Government can stigmatize them, would find barriers and dams in the way when they came to be let loose upon us and upon the Treasury. So they went on justifying and proving that we had done worse in other instances; that we ought not to make an investigation here; that this was not near so bad as the pension instances to which I adverted.

Mr. President, it was conscience, I think, that made cowards of some of us, at all events; not physical cowards, but apprehension of the adverse decision in the future upon which a dozen bills are already pending in the other House, to be followed by the whole forty-five thousand ultimately, if you come to have a Government which is made up in all three of its departments with those who may be favorable to the consideration of the claims of the disloyal.

There is little else to say. In regard to the pension claims, the Senator from Missouri alluded to them as being thousands in number. There can not be two thousand which were passed by both this Congress and the last. They came in something of a rush in the last Congress, because they had been accumulating for years. There had been hostilities in committees that were insurmountable, and the discussions upon the pension claims took on very largely the aspect of controversies between the different sections; at least, so it seemed to me. Very few pension claims were acted upon for years.

In the last Congress the acting chairmanship of the Committee on Pensions fell upon myself, and I determined that those bills should be acted upon or I would quit the Senate. They were acted upon, and a great many more than usual reached the Executive, I think through my fault, if it be a fault, more than that of anybody else. They were the accumulations of years in the natural outgrowth of time, in its due succession. Had the developments of time been properly taken care of as they came to the surface—if the bills had been passed when they ought to have been passed, President Cleveland never would have been troubled with any more than the usual number.

I only made the motion to reconsider in the beginning for the reason that it does seem to me that attention should be called to claims such as we are passing upon to-day, these claims generally accruing, as they do, from the Southern section of the country, growing out of the war itself, and dependent even for jurisdiction upon the controverted question of loyalty on the part of the claimant, and with such tremendous temptations to establish loyalty, when there is an almost universal suspicion that disloyalty was the actual fact in the case of every claimant. I say that when there is such looseness as has now been developed, nothing like the thoroughness of investigation that takes place with a pension claim, in the allowance of these claims, and when there is such a determined effort already manifested to collect even the claims of disloyal claimants, I was well justified in calling attention to the sharp criticism made upon the action of the committee of the Senate and of the legislative department of this country by the vetoes of the President and by others who support him in reference to the comparatively few pension claims that the President has destroyed. All of them put together, all this great exercise of power, even if the President be right, will not save to the country more than $50,000 a year.

I assert—it is of no use to make appeals to anybody—I assert that if there be any class of claims wherein haste could be justifiable, where in case of uncertainty or of doubt in the nature of the proof the benefit should be given to the claimant, it is these pension claims. We are not even likely to go wrong. If we do, we are on the side of probable right, and on the side of a great cause which gave us our existence and our jurisdiction of the subject-matter itself.

I rose only to remind the Senate and the country that we should treat pension claims, and our action in the effort to enact them into law, with at least the same degree of consideration that is demanded for these other and, it seems to me, vastly less meritorious claims.

I withdraw my motion to reconsider unless some other Senator wishes to speak.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I move——

Mr. HARRIS. The withdrawal of the motion to reconsider leaves the bill passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then recurs on the formal motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate ask for a conference on the bill and the amendments, to which the Chair supposes there is no objection, and it is so ordered.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

Mr. SPOONER. I appeal to the Senator from Nevada to permit the Senator from Arkansas to address the Senate upon this question. He is a member of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLAIR. I renew the motion for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suppose the question is disposed of, and what I have to say will not have any effect on it. I only desire to call attention to what seems to me to be an unjust criticism of the Court of Claims in the execution of its duty. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] characterized it as "looseness."

I am very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] for having called the attention of the Senate to this question. I believe it is a very great evil, and one that requires the serious consideration of members of this body. I believe that great harm is likely to result if there is no careful investigation of the evil to which the attention of the Senate has been to-day called. But certainly no just criticism can be made on the action of the court or on the representatives of the Government in the court.

I am advised by the Attorney-General, who looks after the interests of the Government in these cases, that in every instance when a case is sent to the court he asks the Departments for whatever they have which will throw light upon the claim. Every means is resorted to in order to find out everything that can be found about the claim, not only in the archives of the Government but everywhere else.

As the Senator from Wisconsin very clearly stated to the Senate, there are no means within reach of the Department of Justice to make investigations where these claims originate, as was the case with the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments, and this Department can not be blamed because it is unable to find out whatever facts might be ascertained by making an investigation at the place where the claimants live. But that there is some wrong, that there is somebody to blame in these cases, seems to me to be perfectly clear. The first section of the Bowman act, the act of March 3, 1883, provides—

> That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

Think for one moment of the condition in which this court is placed. Any man choosing to do so comes here and asks a member of this body to introduce a bill to pay him a lot of money or to relieve him from certain hardships he believes he has suffered in the past. A similar request goes to the other House of Congress; and these cases are sent by thousands to the Court of Claims. There is an affidavit or two, a little bit of evidence of one sort and another, a statement on the part of the claimant that he has been a loyal man, and with the meager evidence that is submitted here goes an order down from the Congress of the United States to the Court of Claims to find the facts and report them to Congress. There are no adequate means provided by which the court may know all the facts, and they are compelled to make some sort of a report on the order made to them by Congress; and when this light and unsatisfactory evidence is presented to them they must determine on which side the weight of the evidence stands.

It must necessarily be the case that in many instances the testimony will be such as would not satisfy anybody that the truth was fully ascertained and brought out by the evidence as presented to the court, and yet no means are provided by Congress for the Attorney-General or for the court to send out into the country and ascertain what the truth is, to get evidence on the other side of the case; and the ex parte statements as they come up and as presented by the claimants' attorneys must be accepted by the court as the finding of facts, and reported accordingly.

The intimation I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to make, that there was more or less of partisan bearing in this thing, is wholly without foundation. The judges of the Court of Claims were appointed under a Republican administration, and they are Republicans. None of them can be suspected of any sympathy with any of these claimants. It is true that under the present Administration the Department of Justice has Democratic officers, but the leading man who is in charge of those cases was himself a Union soldier, and he is as absolutely free from any sort of sympathy with an attempt to have paid to any man an unjust or unworthy claim as can be found on the face of the earth. I know he is capable and he is faithful and efficient, and there can be no sort of charge made, and there ought not to be a suspicion entertained by anybody that there is anything but perfect fairness in the efforts to find out the truth in these cases. I believe the fault lies in the fact that committees of this body send these cases down to the Court of Claims by thousands and without any regard or reference to the reports they have here.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean to say committees of this body?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Did I say of this body? I meant to say of Congress. I claim that the committee to which I have the honor to belong, and of which the Senator from Wisconsin is the honored chairman, has been discreet and careful and considerate in sending claims to the Court of Claims. We may have sent some that should not have been sent, but we have made an effort to have investigation made only where we believed there was such a case made on the part of the claimant as would justify him in having a full and fair investigation of his claim, and we have not sent cases by the hundred down there to be investigated without knowing whether there was any merit in them or not.

In justice to the claimants, and in justice to the Department of Justice, I thought it was but right that I should call attention to these facts, and to the manner in which these things are done.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to utter only two or three sentences, if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] will permit me.

I do not think any Senator on either side of the Chamber, whatever other matter of criticism he may find in regard to me, will say that since I have been in public service here I have not dealt with justice, as far as I could, with reference to all claimants against this Government from whatever part of the country they may have come. I think that the honor of this Government is as much concerned in the payment of a just claim, whether supported by express contract or not, as it is in the payment of the Government bond, without which it would be adjudged a bankrupt Government in the commercial circles of the world.

There is nothing which has seemed to me more objectionable, indeed I might say more contemptible, than the spirit which attempts (if there be such a spirit anywhere) to get a reputation for vigilant care of the Treasury or for public virtue by an indiscriminate attack upon persons who come here to make claims against the Government.

I quite agree with what has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Arkansas, that it will be necessary for Congress to re-examine and reconsider the policy which was adopted with my entire concurrence three or four years ago of calling in the assistance of the Court of Claims for a judicial determination of claims. The machine so far has not worked well. I make no criticism upon that court, but of course a court can only decide upon the evidence submitted to it, and it is manifest that not only in a few cases but in hundreds and thousands of cases the evidence which had enabled the Southern Claims Commission and the Departments heretofore to deal with them justly and fairly in most instances has not reached the Court of Claims, and the rescripts which come back here come as the result of the examination of ex parte testimony and testimony very indefinitely sifted. I think that will be the opinion. The Senator from Arkansas bows his head. I think I may appeal to every member of the Committee on Claims without distinction of party or residence for the truth of that statement.

So far as the Committee on Claims of the Senate is concerned, I do not believe any bill has reached the Senate with a favorable report where the claim is not founded upon principles and policies which have been certainly for ten or fifteen years acted upon by the Senate. There has been no opening of the door wider than it was before. There has been no relaxation on the part of the Committee on Claims of the Senate or on the part of any member of that committee of either party of the old rules, which we endeavored to apply as faithfully as we could when the party to which I belong had the uncontrolled ascendency in both Houses of Congress and in the executive department.

There is one possible exception, and that exception is found in the case which was passed by the Senate a few weeks ago, in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] took a special interest by reason of representing the persons concerned in it. That was the case of a church at Chattanooga, Tenn., where a claim of that church for the material of the church building taken for military purposes was allowed and paid. That unquestionably would not have been granted under the same circumstances by the committee to an ordinary claimant; but it rests for its vindication, if it can be vindicated at all, upon a principle which I have been prepared to act on for a great many years, and which I have myself repeatedly urged upon Congress, both in the Senate and in the other House when I was a member of it.

I think it would be desirable, and would be a valuable example in regard to all future wars, foreign and domestic, to have the Government pay institutions of religion, education, and charity for losses which have been occasioned to them by the direct action of the Government in war. It is no new principle. It is a principle which was acted upon in some instances by the British Government in regard to this country during the Revolution. It is a principle upon which General Washington acted in paying out of his own pocket for an injury occasioned to the college at Princeton, and it is a principle upon which Louis XVI acted in replacing injuries which were occasioned to buildings in this country during our Revolution by the operation of the French army.

There are less than $300,000, I think less than $200,000, of these claims, all told; and I should be very glad for one to see them paid. I should be more delighted than by any public or political honor or good fortune which could come to me if before my public life ends I could be the instrument of having the old college of William and Mary in Virginia rebuilt at the public charge.

But that exception, if it be an exception, is the only one (with the general fact I have stated that there has been no relaxation and no proposed relaxation on the part of the Committee on Claims in the Senate or of any member of it) of the old rule which has been acted upon for so many years.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. 6105) donating two 6-pound brass cannons to the Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that it be taken up now and passed. It is a very small matter and need hardly go to the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must ask that it go to the Committee on Military Affairs. We have reported against giving things that we do not have, until I think we ought to get another chance to make a similar report on the question.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government has no brass cannon, and we can not give away what we have not got.

Mr. CULLOM. I supposed, as the other House passed the bill, that we certainly had what it was proposed to give.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 3474) amendatory of an act authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., approved February 3, 1887;

An act (S. 3226) granting the Leavenworth Rapid Transit Railway Company the right to construct and operate its railroad through a portion of the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.;

An act (S. 1070) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong;

An act (S. 2721) granting a pension to Jackson Chapman;

An act (S. 3076) granting a pension to Mary M. Shattuck;

An act (S. 3166) granting a pension to William F. Pike; and

An act (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2197) empowering and directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register and enroll as American vessels certain sailing vessels of foreign construction, repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, and named the Josephine and M. C. Upper, respectively; and

An act (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker.

WILLIAM MACKEY.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate postponed indefinitely the bill (S. 3101) for the relief of William Mackey, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHIPMAN, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. PAYSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the bill to restrict Chinese immigration may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882. The Chair hears no objection. The bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor on the question of reconsidering the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I learned from the speeches made against this bill yesterday that there was a general misapprehension not only of the circumstances, but of the condition of the negotiations and the effect of passing the bill. The legal effect of the passage of the bill was well stated, however, by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], and I will read his statement of the case. He said:

I have one word more to say in regard to the situation, as I understand it, which would be produced by the passage of this bill, and then the ratification by the Chinese Empire of the pending treaty. If ratifications are exchanged between this Government and the Chinese Empire, which is dependent upon the Executive here so far as this nation is concerned, this act, if it shall pass, falls to the ground, for it is a settled proposition that a treaty and a law are of equal import and dominion domestically, and the latter one, therefore, whether law or treaty, is the paramount power.

If this bill shall pass it will not interfere at all with the ratification of that treaty, if China is willing to ratify it, nor will it interfere with its promulgation by the President or its becoming a law and superseding the act that we are passing to-day.

That being the case, it is well to examine the necessities for this proposed law. I believe that we have gone wrong from the beginning in assuming that we had no right to say who should come and live among us. All of our treaties with China in this regard have proceeded upon a decidedly false basis. The United States should never surrender the power to protect its own citizens and to say who should come here and who should not.

I think this mistake was made in attempting to guard against what was a notorious and manifest evil. Chinese were imported as coolies here. We had been legislating against the cooly trade. Chinese were taken to other countries as coolies. In the Burlingame treaty an effort was made to stipulate against that cooly trade, which they deny is practiced now, and probably it is not in that aggravated sense in which it was carried on in exporting Chinese. I say the cooly trade is not in operation between the United States and China to the same extent that it was between China, the West Indies, and South America. But the fifth article of the Burlingame treaty provided against what both parties recognized as an illegal traffic in coolies, as follows:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, or trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

The intent and meaning of that article of the Burlingame treaty was to stipulate against the cooly trade, but the phraseology went beyond the intention and laid down a general proposition that the right of expatriation was recognized, a general principle that we had been advocating; but the plain intent and meaning was to stipulate against this infamous traffic, which was then in vogue, and I do not believe that the Chinese Government have taken the slightest offense, or had the right to take the slightest offense, if after entering into that treaty we had exercised our inherent right to say who should come here and who should not. I think the Hayes veto of the Chinese restriction bill of 1879 was a grave mistake. Of course it was founded on the want of knowledge.

The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] says that as Secretary of State he advised the vetoing of the bill of 1879. I do not think he did so with a knowledge of the situation at all. I do not think there was anything in the Burlingame treaty which should have been construed or held by us for one moment to tie our hands so that we could not relieve ourselves of this evil. Besides, it is very doubtful whether that bill of 1879, which was vetoed by President Hayes, was in conflict with the treaty in any sense. These Chinese come here in one sense voluntarily; they agree to leave China, and most of the coolies agree to go. They leave voluntarily; all the cooly trade is done in this way. The great mass of the laborers that have come to this country have come under contracts with the Chinese Six Companies that they will come here and work a certain number of years and be subject to the orders and dictation of these companies and be returned home at the end of the time, dead or alive. That was the contract, and they came under those contracts, and it was straining a point to assume that that was voluntary immigration to this country. But it was so construed, and all parties became committed to dealing with this question by negotiation, and another treaty was negotiated, but the old treaty was not abrogated; only an addition was made to it; it was not abrogated at all. In the preamble of the treaty of 1880 we find the following:

Whereas the Government of the United States, because of the constantly increasing immigration of Chinese laborers to the territory of the United States, and the embarrassments consequent upon such immigration, now desires to negotiate a modification of the existing treaties which shall not be in direct contravention of their spirit.

The stipulation that none but those who come voluntarily shall be allowed to enter and that both countries would pass penal laws to prevent the cooly trade still remains, and I hardly think it can be regarded as voluntary immigration when a laborer who is a cooly-serf makes a contract with these companies to serve them a given number of years and be returned back, dead or alive. The people who come in that way do not come within the spirit of the treaty. A veto for such a reason was a blunder, and such a veto illustrates the danger of executive usurpation.

The treaty of 1880 stipulated that the Chinese might go and come. No action was taken for about two years. Then an act was passed providing that those who left after that date should be allowed to come with certificates and that those who had left the United States between 1880 and 1882 might return without certificates. That law has been amended, and still the tide of immigration comes. They come not only with certificates, but without them. You can not distinguish them. A Chinaman receives a certificate, and if he does not want it he gives it to another. Investigation shows that great numbers of fraudulent certificates have gotten out in various ways. It has been investigated by the grand jury in California and they find that there has been a system of fraud and deception invented by that ingenious people to get extra certificates in every possible way. And not only that, but this previous residence is a question of parol so far as testimony is concerned.

That is the way it stands. Being situated in that way, all the laws you may pass will be of no avail. As long as any come by law, more will come by fraud. Experience has demonstrated that.

In 1886 an act was passed through the Senate which was as stringent as it could be. It did not pass the House of Representatives, but the Administration undertook to negotiate, the idea being that the object could only be secured by negotiation.

In the early part of this session I introduced a resolution calling on the President to negotiate a treaty. He had it under consideration. China is very slow. Finally a bill was reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations which was intended to remedy as much as possible the evils under the existing treaty, and before action was taken upon it we got this treaty.

This treaty provides that Chinamen who are not here shall not return. That was the meaning put on the language by every Senator, I believe, in discussing it, and it is even said that many thought our amendment was unnecessary because the treaty excluded all Chinese without amendment. Article I is a plain, simple declaration and a short one. It is as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

If we had ratified that treaty it would have gone into effect last May, four months since, and from four to five thousand Chinese have since come. It might then have been a harsh thing, but they knew very well that this treaty had been negotiated. They had been preparing for it during all that time, and under the present circumstances it is by no means harsh. The Chinese Government had made up their mind to submit fully and to recognize the condition that we would prohibit that immigration, and they were willing that it should be prohibited.

We find in the preamble to this treaty the following:

Whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much-deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States.

We amended this treaty, not to change its meaning but to make its meaning definite, because the people on the Pacific coast, who had seen so much of evasion, feared evasion under this treaty. We amended it for the purpose of making its provisions clearer, and for nothing else. We were told here at the time we amended it that we had not changed its meaning, and we were told that it was satisfactory to the Chinese minister. That was over four months ago.

From that time until now the Chinese have been rushing into California at every port and in every direction more rapidly than heretofore, and we are first informed that the treaty is rejected by China, and then we are told it has been postponed for consideration. China is very deliberate, and Senators tell us that China is liable to postpone it a long time; that China may postpone it for two or three years, and they also say that these exchanges are sometimes delayed for several years. They read precedents from China and other countries to show that we are liable to wait for two years before she will consider the treaty. She knew very well the urgency of this case. China knew very well that for the last four years Congress had been trying to legislate to stop this tide. She knew very well, her minister knew, the troubles these people were producing by their presence in San Francisco and through all the country; they knew the urgency of the case perfectly well; and when this treaty was negotiated and they agreed to it, they agreed that this immigration might be stopped at once; but they have kept us for four months when there was no such excuse for delay as there was when other treaties were made, because we now have steam-ship and telegraphic communication. The old sailing ships that went to China took months to make the trip, but now we can communicate daily. They know perfectly well what is going on, and if this is going to be delayed for years I will try to picture to you some of the consequences before I sit down. If we pass this bill we can then wait for China to act. If we pass this bill she will ratify the treaty. If we do not and adjourn, it will take her years to act. That is perfectly evident.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says that if China rejected this treaty he was perfectly willing to pass the bill. I say they have delayed it an unreasonable time, and if they ratify the treaty the bill in the mean time will only operate until they do. It will take away from them all reason for delay; it will take away the motive for delay.

These Chinese companies are the parties that are influential in maintaining Chinese diplomacy. They control and manage it, and they are reaping a rich harvest out of this delay. I say take away the reward they are getting daily for the delay, and then we shall have action.

I am told to wait. We have waited, we have waited long years for negotiation. I do not believe any negotiation was ever necessary. We have failed to protect our people from a cancer that is destroying the Pacific coast and will eat out the life-blood of any part of the country wherever it goes.

It was suggested by a Senator yesterday that it was strange that these people could have so many vices and still have survived through the ages and be 400,000,000 strong to-day. I do not pretend to discuss the morals or the manners of the better class of Chinese who have homes and families in China. But you do not take into account the situation here. None come to this country but the very lowest class of Chinese and the scum of Canton and other seaport towns. The men who come here are the cooly laborers. They have no families; they come here without any of the family restraints, if they have any, in China; there is nothing of that kind here, and the women they bring here they buy and import, and every day there are fights in Chinatown over women that are stolen from one company by another. The class of men that fight for these women and steal them are called highbinders. Cases of that kind appear in the courts daily. A committee of the Senate examined this question in 1878, and what they say with regard to the women is true to-day, only there are more of them now than then.

It was proved before the committee that Chinese women in California are bought and sold for prostitution, and are treated worse than dogs; that they are held in a most revolting condition of slavery. It was further shown that the Chinese have a quasi government among themselves independent of our laws, authorizing the punishment of offenders against Chinese customs, even to the taking of life. It was further shown that violent hostilities exist between Chinamen from different parts of China, who, coming together in California by accident or otherwise, engage in deadly feuds and riots, to the disturbance of the public peace.

This traffic in Chinese women is the most revolting spectacle that you can imagine, and in the heart of San Francisco to have these female slaves polluting a great city, destroying its morals, carrying on their traffic in broad daylight boldly, is horrible to contemplate. They bring them in still by proof that they are wives or that they are daughters, and all this business has to be passed upon by the courts. The traffic goes on, and they spread the most deadly consequences with which any city was ever visited. Leprosy prevails in China, and there are constant statements of discoveries of Chinese lepers in San Francisco. Terror exists throughout the whole city for fear of this contamination.

Then these people, being nearly all males, being all industrious, except the gamblers and the highbinders and the roughs, take the place of our white people. For every thousand of them that come to our shores a thousand young men and young women have got to be crowded out of their places. They live by the hundreds in small rooms, they sleep in the same rooms packed in on shelves from the floor to the ceiling, their work-benches in the middle, their cooking apparatus in one corner, and in order to economize space and continue at work they work by eight or ten hour shifts and change, some sleep while others work, and they stay in that small space. The food they eat would not support white people at all. Consequently they invade every avocation; they make all the underwear for the women, they engage in making clothing, boots, shoes, cigars, and take away the avocations that should build up the city and make it prosperous, and they spread over the different towns and carry with them their women slaves wherever they go. In every little town you will find a Chinatown, polluting and corrupting the youth, spreading disease among them, and there is no help for this. Whatever these people may be at home, the coolies that come here bring nothing but evil to our country.

It is said that we must overlook all this; that we must legislate in view of the fact that there are 400,000,000 of these people in China and of the great amount of trade we have with them, the vast advantage we are to get, and that China may break off relations with us. There is no danger of that; not the slightest. China understands her interests as well as any other country. She protects them against every country n the world except the English.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire how these Chinamen work, of whom the Senator has been speaking, where they are huddled into single rooms with their workshops in the same room? Do they work each on his individual interest, or is there some co-operation by which they work for the common benefit?

Mr. STEWART. There is some co-operation. The Six Companies are at the head of it. They fall into corporations and co-operations, and the Six Companies are composed of very intelligent men. They organize them in that way and have the benefit of their labor, to what extent I do not know; what percentage they get I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. That is to say, it is the idea of the Senator that these Chinamen who are at work are not at work as independent individuals?

Mr. STEWART. Not at all. It is a combination under the management of the Six Companies. There is no individual effort at all. It is an organized effort on the part of these powerful companies to underwork, to work for lower wages, and starve out the white people wherever they go, and they succeed; they organize for that purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to be allowed to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. How long has the dreadful state of affairs to which the Senator alludes existed in the State of California? Is it recent, or does it extend back?

Mr. STEWART. It has existed to some extent from their first coming. When they first came they went into the mines. They were not engaged in manufacturing. They followed in the ravines to mine where the white men had been and gone, and they did not come in conflict. They did not, in the first instance, enter into manufactures, but into mining, although they had pestilential headquarters all the time in San Francisco, but it was mostly confined to traders. They grew as the manufacturing interests grew, and as they congregated the State grew, and they grew with the growth of it and kept pace with the other population.

Mr. GEORGE. Has it existed for a dozen years?

Mr. STEWART. More than that.

Mr. GEORGE. Twenty?

Mr. STEWART. Not precisely twenty. The system, as I say, commenced with a small beginning and is growing every day and every year. It is worse now than it ever was. It will be worse next year, and so on.

Mr. PLATT. The Burlingame treaty is only twenty years old.

Mr. STEWART. It had not at that time been brought so forcibly to the attention of the people. There was very little idea of manufactures among the Chinese at that time. It had not developed itself so that it could be seen and appreciated as it is now. The young men and young women had not been thrown out of employment to any great extent then.

Mr. GEORGE. What kind of manufacturing are they engaged in?

Mr. STEWART. Everything you can conceive of. They are engaged in manufacturing boots, shoes, hosiery, underclothing, cigars, everything that men wear and that women wear, and many other things. There is no kind of manufacturing but what they can turn their hands to, everything that does not require a large establishment, although they have got some very large establishments.

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me there to put in an exhibit showing the occupations they were engaged in and the prices.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have that put in.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a statement that I have showing the different occupations in which the Chinese in San Francisco are engaged and the prices they receive in comparison with the prices paid to white persons in the same occupations. It is as follows:

Occupation.	White.	Chinese.
Bakers (country only), per week	$8 to $15	$3 to $9
Cigar-makers:
Per 1,000	8 to 17	4 to 6
Weekly wages—average	10 to 12	6 to 7
Weekly wages—girls	10 to 12	.....
Weekly wages—boys	4 to 6	.....
Cooks:
City, per month	55	20
Country, per month	55	25
Kitchen help, per month	20	12
Confectioners (country only), per month	45	22
Clothing:
Men's shirts, etc., per week	6 to 10	5 to 8
Women's underwear, per week	5 to 8	4 to 7
Tweed suits, etc., per week	18 to 20	9 to 13
Coat-makers, per week	18 to 24	9 to 15
Trousers-makers, per week	14 to 18	8 to 12
Harness-makers, per week	9 to 18	5 to 11
Paper-bag makers, per week	5 to 12	3 to 9
Paper-box makers, per week	6 to 15	4 to 12
Shoemakers:
Lasters, per week	11	8
Fitters, per week	15	11
Machinists, per week	14 to 25	9 to 17
Nailers, per week	12	9
Trimmers, per week	17	12
Girls, per week	7	.....
Boys, per week	5	.....

Mr. STEWART. They invade every employment, and, what is worse, they have a schedule of prices there for the whites, so that no establishment carried on by white labor can live in competition with Chinese, and the consequence is that we hear charges all the while, criminations and recriminations among persons that they are using Chinese goods, and they are smuggled into stores by back doors, etc. They make a pretense of hiring white labor, but really the work is done by the Chinese. It has been charged all over the country that diseases are communicated from the cigars they make. There is a great deal of complaint about that, and undoubtedly there is some foundation for it.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator explain this to me, which I do not exactly understand: How is it that the white laborers there succeed in getting about 100 per cent., as I caught the reading of the list of the Senator from Oregon, more than the Chinese do? How is that!

Mr. STEWART. I will tell you. It is because there are many good people in San Francisco who will not hire Chinese and will take the whites and get along the best they can, and there is a strong sentiment against hiring Chinese, but, as I say, it is done frequently by people who can not help themselves. These wages are no more than are necessary for a white person to live upon, but the Chinaman can thrive on the wages he gets because it does not cost him very much to live, but the competition is ruinous and destructive.

Every month they are coming in by the thousand, and they displace a thousand or two thousand of white young men and women, besides diseasing the city, besides making a whole section of that city a pestilence and disgrace to civilization which you can see there any day. In addition to all that, in addition to their immorality, they have no homes here, no wives. The women they bring are slaves for a vile purpose, bought and sold; and we must tolerate that spectacle because China is unwilling to make a treaty!

I say until she signs the treaty let us stop their coming for a little while, because if the treaty be ratified between us, the coming of all except those named in the treaty will be stopped. They were all cut off last spring, and they have had ample time to get here. There is no hardship about this thing.

It has been stated here that this treaty was satisfactory to the Pacific coast. The Pacific coast will take any relief they can get. They are not satisfied with treaties at all and never were, but they will take anything they can get that will go to mitigate the evil. I have advocated and am willing to take any scheme that will be one step in advance. I hold in my hand an article published a few days ago (September 1) in the San Francisco Bulletin, which is a leading paper, a conservative paper, taken by all classes, and voices the sentiment of the people as well as any other paper upon this subject. They are all united. Take any of them and you get the same sentiment. To show how they feel about the present situation I will read the article:

EFFECT OF THE REJECTION OF THE CHINESE TREATY.

California should rejoice that the Government of China has rejected the new treaty. It would have tied up this country for twenty years, and was intended to give the Chinese now in the State perpetual rights here, and to increase their number by as many as could be smuggled in through our ports, or by the back doors kept open in British Columbia and Mexico. These doors are bound to open wider and wider as the facilities of transportation increase. The new treaty would have enlarged the Chinese slave-trade, and encouraged the building of more steam-ships and the organization of new lines to profit by the demoralizing traffic. The course of this Government is plain. The Burlingame treaty must be abrogated, or treated as the Australians have treated a similar compact. It was a fraud from the start and our nation was deceived. The Chinamen now in this country will receive good treatment and be allowed to enrich themselves while they stay with us. But when they go away to spend their money and have a holiday in China, there they must stay. The transportation companies are welcome to make as much as they can by carrying Chinamen to China, but not one cent for bringing them back.

This country knows how it nearly lost its civilization by protecting the African slave-trade until all ships engaged in it should wear out. It has been terribly warned, and the American people, thus enlightened by experience, will not now go deliberately to work to establish Asiatic slavery all along the Pacific coast, with the certainty of eventual loss of our civilization. Yet it is a marvel that a treaty that tended in that direction was agreed to by the Administration, and would have been accepted by China but for the amendments inserted by the Senate.

That is about the view taken there; but I believe that under this treaty we can legislate more freely than we could under the other, which is a step in advance, and I so stated at the time, though others differed with me, and I voted for the treaty, but I did not believe it was a remedy. I have believed at all times that legislation was the real and the only adequate remedy. Without regard to treaty we ought to say who can come among us and stay among us. It is a police regulation that we ought to exercise independent of all the world, and I feel something like the people of California do. I hope China will reject the treaty if she has not already done so. But whether she has done so or not, she has procrastinated an unreasonable time, and we have a right to have this check for a little time to see what they are doing.

If they are going to deliberate, let us stop this now in September which they agreed in the treaty might be stopped in May. I say that is but fair. If you go before the people of California, who have seen this, and attempt to get a hearing for an excuse for continuing the evil, no one, high or low, will listen to you. Whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, every man who loves his country will say to you, "This evil is intolerable, and the first principles of self-preservation demand that it shall be immediately stopped." It will be years before it will disappear, but they say it should not be increased. The pest-house in San Francisco should not be enlarged. That disgraceful quarter known as Chinatown, the Chinese portion of San Francisco, should not be enlarged by another invasion.

Now, inasmuch as China has willfully kept the treaty back, it is our duty to act and to act promptly. But we are told of the great commerce that we shall lose if we offend China. There is no danger of that, as I commenced saying some time ago when I was interrupted. They understand their interests as well as any people. The balance of trade is largely in their favor as against us. We sent them last year, in round numbers, $6,000,000 of our products of various kinds, and we bought of them $19,000,000 worth, leaving a balance against us of nearly $13,000,000, for which we sent gold to China to buy commodities.

Mr. GEORGE. We send silver to China.

Mr. STEWART. That is good for China. She is not going to dispense with it there.

Mr. GEORGE. We did not send any gold to China.

Mr. STEWART. We sent the precious metals. It is worse yet if we sent silver, because silver has been regarded in all the ages as the better metal of the two until this last conspiracy. I say they are not going to give up that trade.

Another thing. There are in this country, I can not tell exactly, but undoubtedly about two hundred thousand Chinese. They are all laboring men; they labor for other people. They are wage-workers, and they send their money to China.

I think it has been estimated by those who are best acquainted with the subject that they send on an average at least $100 a year to China. Some have put the amount as high as $200; but at $100 apiece, they send each year to China, there being 200,000 of them, twenty millions of gold and silver, mostly of silver however, I think. You will find that sent out of this country. That these laborers take away. They leave nothing; for wherever they go they leave nothing but burnt ground and the little shanties they live in, which are not much superior to the wigwam of the Indian, and they leave such a filthy place that every one is shocked. They make no improvements. Of course they have no schools, because they are adults and laborers. They leave nothing in this country. They send out about twenty millions, and $13,000,000 balance of trade added to that makes $33,000,000 sent out from us to China each year.

Do you think the Chinese Government is going to make much fuss about it? China has the advantage of all the world except England. England is the only country that gets anything like even with China, and she has a balance of trade as against China of $24,000,000, and the way she obtains that is by her gunboats and guns and armies to make China buy her opium. Otherwise England makes nothing by trading with China, except what she forces China to take by her armies, and every other nation in the world has the balance of trade largely against it in favor of China. That is a great country. Everything they need they can produce; it is a self-sustaining country. It will buy nothing from abroad except what it is forced to buy. Consequently there is no danger of China ever throwing up our trade, which is all in her favor. We have never done anything to offend China. If we will not allow her laborers to come here and take possession of our country, she has already said she would consent to our action. She agreed that it must be stopped last May, but as long as the Chinese Six Companies can make money out of it they will keep the treaty there.

I think it was wise in the House of Representatives to send this bill here, and I think it was wise in the Senate to vote by an overwhelming majority to pass it, and I think it would be the greatest blunder of the age, with all the facts before us, now to vote to reconsider this bill.

I have heard here records hauled over and discussed and votes read day after day of Senators who are attempting to follow the labyrinths of these treaties in their votes and making them conform, claiming, as you all claim to-day, that you are in favor of excluding Chinese, but you want to do it in a certain way. You are all in favor of it now, but you want to do it in a certain way. If you do not pass this bill and Congress adjourns, this whole question will confront you at the next session, and this evil will go on increasing and increasing.

The House of Representatives are considering charges now against our judges, who have hitherto stood above reproach and their decisions respected in every part of the Union, because under your laws and the decisions of the Supreme Court they have had to issue writs of habeas corpus and allow Chinamen to come in. I do not believe that one in ten has a right to land under your act excluding contract labor.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me before he commences on that point, I wish to call his attention to the statement he made just now. I understood him to say that $22,000,000 in coin was exported from the United States to China every year. I have a tabular statement on that subject, which differs very much from what the Senator says. In 1886 the exports from the United States to China of gold and silver and bullion amounted to $230,000; in 1887 to $117,500, and it so happens that in those years there were imported into the United States from China, in 1886 $2,400, and in 1887, $981,284. So it appears that in the year 1887 there was $117,500 exported from the United States to China, and nearly nine times as much as that imported from China to the United States—$981,284.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator takes what is imported through the custom-house, where a record is kept of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any other method by which we can tell the difference between the exports and imports of gold and silver from and to this country?

Mr. STEWART. I did not pretend to give the exact amount of gold or silver exported to China, because nobody knows. The Chinamen have been mining on the Pacific coast ever since the mines were opened, but there is no record of what they have taken to China; besides, the Chinese merchants do business as all other merchants do, and send money by bills of exchange and in other ways. But one thing is certain, the Chinamen carry or send in some way about $100 apiece each year to China. How they get it there is immaterial. Of course it does not appear in the public records.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator disputes the official records?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly I do. I dispute the fact that they contain this information.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know upon this subject of trade, as he will not stand by the official record, what evidence has he to make the statement that there is $22,000,000 sent?

Mr. STEWART. I have the information from Chinese; I have it in general estimates that there is from $100 to $200 a year sent by each Chinaman. I know a great many Chinamen, and I have heard them discuss the question. The Chinese who go home carry the money on their persons. They travel back and forth a great deal. There are thousands of them going constantly. How they get the money home, by what means, I do not know. That will not necessarily appear in the records.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator to say that those who remain here at work are sending $100 apiece every year to China.

Mr. STEWART. By their agents who are going. It is managed by the Six Companies. There is great secrecy about the whole business. I do not know the details, but there is no doubt about the fact. They send their entire wages. The companies attend to it, and it is all taken home. I have been told by Chinamen that there are thousands upon thousands of Chinese laborers who are called rich at home after they have returned from the United States. They spend nothing here. That we all know. As to how they ship their money, I have not the details and never took the pains to inquire into it. It is a fact agreed upon on all hands. Now, to show that we are not in much danger——

Mr. MITCHELL. The statistics of articles imported from China for the fiscal year 1884–'85, not including gold and silver, show that the total imports from China to the United States were $16,293,698, while the exports were $6,396,500.

Mr. GEORGE. I was only calling attention to the difference between the statement of the Senator from Nevada and the official records of the country.

Mr. STEWART. There is no difference; it is not in the records.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that these Chinamen do not register the amount of money they take away at the custom-house. There is no pretense of that at all. They will not go to the expense of doing the business in that way. If one Chinaman is going back to China he will carry for a dozen, and he will carry it on his own person.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know, as nobody sees the money that the Chinamen carry, as they do not tell anybody and they do not register it, how the Senator from Nevada knows how much they do carry?

Mr. STEWART. I did not pretend to state. I said it was generally believed, stated by the Chinese and by citizens who have paid attention to the subject, that it was estimated that from one hundred to two hundred dollars a year was sent by each Chinaman. We know they send all they get. Chinamen never invest a dollar in this country; they leave only burnt ground behind them in this country, and send all they can get home, and then they have contracts to have their bones sent there in case they should die here.

Mr. President, there has been so much said about our gains in trade with China that I will again say that it appears from the published reports that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, we imported from China $19,076,780, and we exported to China $6,246,626. Great Britain, including Hong Kong, imported from China $65,600,000. She, including Hong Kong, exported to China $89,600,000, making a balance of trade in favor of Great Britain of $24,000,000.

The imports and exports of China are pretty nearly evenly balanced. Great Britain is the only country that has any advantage in the trade. She sends her opium there, and carries it there by force of arms, and has that advantage. I say that there is no danger whatever of any interruption of commercial relations with China, because she has everything to gain and nothing whatever to lose by trading with us.

She agreed that last May the immigration of Chinese to this country might be stopped. She agreed to the same proposition that is in this bill last May, but her Six Companies are exercising influence to-day to keep this treaty back, and they will keep it back as long as we will tolerate it. All we have to do is to pass this bill and bring about a final settlement. We must take some action. The idea of being held so firmly by treaty, the idea of being so fearful that we shall offend

China, that we shall do something that is not dignified while the evil is going on, is astounding. It would be well for Senators if they did not live in the upper air, if they did not live in the higher regions, if they lived down among the people and knew something of their wants; but they know nothing, they go into abstractions, and the Senator from New York congratulated himself on having advised the President that the Government of the United States was bound to allow Chinamen to come, no matter how great an evil they were, until we should get China to agree, and that we had no natural right of self-defense, that we were bound to let them come, contracts or no contracts, because of that indefinite language used in the Burlingame treaty which was intended to provide against the cooly trade and never was intended to take away from the United States the right to legislate. We would not have offended China at all if the bill of 1879 had been passed.

That same provision still remains in the Burlingame treaty. It has not been modified. We are at liberty to legislate against the cooly trade, and the Chinamen who came into this country are nothing but coolies. We are expressly authorized to do so. We have passed a law that any person who comes from abroad to this country under a contract for labor here shall be returned, and we have made it the duty of our officers to return them. I have reference to the act of February 23, 1887. Under that law no Chinaman can come. They all come under contract in some form. The testimony taken in 1878 shows that fact. The question submitted to the committee appointed to investigate was whether they came voluntarily or were forced to come. The committee found that they came under contract and that they came voluntarily.

Now, we have passed a law which excludes all that come under contract, and this law on the statute-book against all the world, if properly enforced, would exclude every Chinaman. We only agreed with China to treat her in that respect as we treat the most favored nation. The stipulation with China was that we would treat her in regard to the coming of Chinese the same as we treated the most favored nation. We have passed a law against all nations that their subjects shall not come here under labor contracts, and still China sends them by the thousands under labor contracts, and yet we are told in effect that if we apply the reasonable rule to China that we apply to all she will be offended and we are violating the treaty!

Mr. GEORGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator charges us who want to stand by the public faith and preserve that, at least until China shall decide upon this treaty, with living in the upper air and not living among the people, not knowing anything about their wants. I should like to ask the Senator how long has it been since he came down from the upper air and got among the people on that question?

Mr. STEWART. I have been among the people a good many years on this question.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator another question. I ask, whilst he was in the upper air or when he was among the people, did he at any time favor the enactment of a law which allowed Chinamen to come into this country under a contract to serve here six months after they got here to pay their passage across the Pacific Ocean? And if the Senator ever did advocate a law of that sort, I should like to know whether he was then living in the upper air or down among the people?

Mr. STEWART. I never did. I never voted for any such law. I have always lived among the people, and never had any conscientious scruples about excluding Chinese that came here under cooly contracts to supplant free labor. I never had any idea of postponing such a bill, and was glad to have a chance to vote for a bill of this kind.

Let me say, if Senators vote against this bill it will take a long time to explain it, and I think it is better to go right this time. It will save a great deal of explaining. If my friend from Mississippi votes against it, he will be rising to explain for the next twenty years every time this question comes up, and he will have to enter into some constitutional arguments to show that he was right.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the people of the United States will be as charitable to me if I make a mistake on this subject as the people of the Pacific coast seem to have been charitable to the Senator with his record on this subject.

Mr. STEWART. My record is all right. If it had not been for me the Chinaman would have been a voter before this time. I do not know whether they will be as charitable to the Senator. The Senator from Mississippi has shown remarkable intelligence on this subject, and if he sins now it will be a willful and malicious sin, with all the badges of wickedness, if he goes wrong now after having understood the question, knowing the evil, knowing the necessity, seeing the duplicity of these people, knowing of their holding back this treaty for the purpose of evading its provisions, knowing that they are acting fraudulently, and knowing all the circumstances, and while we have a law on the statute-book that excludes contract laborers even from the most favored nations. We can legislate against the Chinese, we can exclude them, for they all come under contract.

By this law we are authorized to legislate, because the Burlingame treaty never required us to do more than we did for the most favored nation, and we will not allow servile labor from the most favored nation to come here; and still Senators say: "Wait; it is too early to do this; refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations." What information can they give that we do not know now? If they read over these very reports, if they inform themselves of the condition there, they will find that all these Chinamen come under contract.

If they will look at the procrastination of this negotiation for the last two years and see how China has acted, if they will visit San Francisco and the Pacific coast and see the condition there, if they will look at the terrible evil that is there and growing—and it is the fault of our legislation and the fault of China—if they will look at these things they will have to report this bill back without delay. I understand that if it is referred there, the object is that it may rest—rest until when? Until China shall ratify the treaty. Whenever the word goes forth that you will not legislate until China acts one way or the other, then she will bide her own time, and it will be one, two, three, or four years, and perhaps never. As long as we wait the Chinese companies will continue to reap this harvest.

I say that it is the duty of the Senate to remind China that we have waited long enough; to remind China that if she wants this she will not have the benefits of delay; to remind her that we can not have this evil increase. It is time to speak now, and voting against this bill is voting worse and with more light than any man ever voted in the Senate.

It is a pretense to say that you want to exclude Chinese, and say boldly that China may keep the treaty two or three years and that you will wait her good time. She agreed that the immigration should stop last May, and when we acted upon this treaty it was satisfactory to her. She holds it back and sends us this continual stream of laborers, and continues the traffic in vile women, and continues all this pestilential work, and the people of the Pacific coast are asked to wait patiently the good pleasure of China; but we tell her that they may come here as cooly slaves under contract and not come from any other country.

But we are told China has four hundred millions of people and an enormous trade, and we must not offend her, and we must not legislate to protect our own people. That is the only argument. We violate no treaty, for we never did agree that we would treat these people in a different manner from the way we treated those of other countries. Let me read the language of the law to show what we do with the laborers of all countries that come under contracts:

> And it shall be the duty of such State commission, board, or officers so designated to examine into the condition of passengers arriving at the ports within such State in any ship or vessel, and for that purpose all or any of such commissioners or officers, or such other person or persons as they shall appoint, shall be authorized to go on board of and through any such ship or vessel; and if in such examination—

That is an examination to see whether they came under contract or not—> there shall be found among such passengers any person included in the prohibition in this act, they shall report the same in writing to the collector of such port, and such persons shall not be permitted to land, if they have contracts for labor. Here are the Six Companies contracting for labor for the last generation, doing it boldly, bringing them in here by the thousands, all coming in that way. We let them come and say it will be a violation of our treaty stipulation to stop them now after China has consented to our doing so. While she is acting in bad faith in procrastinating, it is said we can not pass this bill. It seems to me that the arguments against this bill are the most flimsy I ever heard. They are not founded in reason, justice, or common sense.

For a man to say that he can not vote for this bill, while he is in favor of excluding the Chinese, is to impeach his honesty or his intelligence on the subject. Any man who has examined this subject, who knows the facts, knows what he is talking about, knows what we have to put up with, is well aware that we have a right to exclude them because China is acting in bad faith in relation to this treaty; that we have the right to exclude them because we have a right to protect our country from pollution, to protect this country dedicated to the people of this country. Everybody knows there is no constitutional reason, there is no reason in good faith, there is no reason whatever against the passage of this bill, and if ever an emergency called aloud upon the Senate to act it is this which is upon us now.

I wish you had to argue this on the Pacific coast. Pick your own jury, take any twelve men on the Pacific coast. If you can get any one of that region, from the base of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, of any party, to say this bill ought not to pass, then I will say no more. The thing is so absolutely right that it meets with universal approval, and no man dare in that country say "nay," because there is no reason, I say there is no consideration strong enough to allow the country to be polluted as these people are polluting it. There are no reasons of state that are sacred enough to have us abandon our own people, abandon them to these polluting diseases that are brought there, abandon them to conditions under which they can not exist, do it for the sake of trade with China, when China has from twenty to thirty millions the better of the trade every year, and the trade will continue whether we do this or not.

I say any man who votes against this bill will regret it while he lives, because if it is voted down the evil will go on. We have now been laboring here for twenty years to exclude them, and we have met similar objections, but never one so flimsy as this. They were predicated upon reason, they were predicated upon some treaty, they were predicated upon some consideration of good faith; but here when China is procrastinating, acting in bad faith, when she has agreed to it, and still continues to send her Chinamen here, when we have passed a law excluding all others of this class of the most favored nation, when the evil has grown so as to be seen of all men, with this condition of things and after the Senate has passed this bill by an almost unanimous vote, it is proposed to reconsider it, to take a step backward, to let the Chinamen come until they get ready to quit. Why? Because of the trade with China, of which she gets five to one!

I appeal to the Senate not to allow this occasion to pass without making this bill a law, and you will send gladness to the hearts of millions of people, lift a burden from the people on the Pacific coast and make them happy. You will send a ray of hope into many a darkened family if you say this evil shall stop.

Pass through the streets of San Francisco or of any other town on the Pacific coast and see the sad havoc that the coming of the Chinese has wrought among the youth, see the destitution and the ruin that have been spread everywhere; witness that, and come here and vote against this bill! If you did, you never would respect yourself afterwards. I tell you it is ignorance, gross ignorance, of the situation, of the magnitude of the evil, that excuses any man for going wrong.

But the evil is so enormous that he has no right to be ignorant. It should be known to all, and if you do not know it there are a great many people in the United States who do know it in all sections, in New York, in Mississippi, in Ohio, and in every other State of the Union. You will find plenty of men all over the country who have knowledge of the evil and the necessity for legislation. It need not be charged to the Pacific coast alone. It is universal among the people who have given attention to it and know something of it.

We ought not to live in the clouds above all other men. We are legislating for the people, for the protection of the people, and we should understand their wants, their desires, and their necessities, and if there ever was a necessity for the passage of a bill there is one for the passage of this bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado withdraw his motion to lay on the table?

Mr. TELLER. I do not at the present time, for I understand that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] desires to address the Senate on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then recurs on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate by a discussion of the Chinese question. As I said the other day, that has passed beyond discussion. The public sentiment of the United States has decided the proposition that the Chinese are to be excluded. All political parties and all factions and shades of political parties agree to that. So it is a question simply of how we shall do it? What is the proper method?

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] called attention a few days since to what he said was undoubtedly the sentiment of the House of Representatives on the passage of this bill, that the House had concluded, as it had a right to conclude, that hereafter in our dealings with China we were to deal with reference to the Chinamen who may come to this country, not under any treaty, but under a general law recognized among civilized people—the right to say who shall and who shall not come to reside within our borders, and who shall come here temporarily or who shall not.

I do not know, Mr. President, that the people of the United States have reached that point. If they have I am glad of it, for that is a position that I took years ago in this body, and which governed my votes on at least two Chinese bills since I have been a member of this Senate, one before the treaty of 1880 and one subsequent thereto. But I want to say, because it has been referred to two or three times, that the Senate was unanimous on the passage of the pending Chinese treaty. I do not suppose that outside the committee that had this treaty in charge there were a half dozen Senators on this floor, who did not come from this section of country where we have had our attention directed to this question, who ever read the treaty.

They heard it read from the desk, and they assumed that presumption of rightfulness (spoken of sometimes by the Senator from Delaware) when a treaty came here, and they voted for it. I understand the whole proceedings have been made public, and therefore I can say that I did not vote for it. I declined to vote for it, and voted against it, and gave then as my reason that I did not approve of any treaty which limited the right of the Government of the United States to deal with this question. I was opposed to putting that into the treaty. I maintained that it was a right that should be always reserved by every nation, to exclude at all times all classes of people that it saw fit to exclude.

I do not understand from my reading of international law or history that it is a cause of complaint if we say to the people of Great Britain, the greatest nation in the world except our own, that they shall not send emigrants to this land. I do not understand that Great Britain can defend herself upon any theory if she should commence a war against us for that. That is not international law. We have a right to say to the people of Great Britain, "We will not accept your citizens of a certain class; we will not accept any people from your territory at all," and they may say the same to us, and that is the end of the whole business.

Of course Great Britain might begin a war on us without any excuse whatever; so might China if we should say to the Chinamen that they can not come here. But neither of those countries would have the support of the civilized world in declaring such a war if we really believed that the people coming here from Great Britain and from China were injurious to us and to our civilization.

Why, Mr. President, the time will come when this country will be so full of Americans born on American soil when there will be no room for anybody else. Has anybody thought, at the rate at which we are progressing in population, how short the time will be when we shall have this continent covered as Belgium is covered with people? To say that when we are overcrowded we shall open our doors at the risk of going to war if we do not, is to say something that is not supported either by the rules that nations have adopted or by any moral ground.

The right of a nation to take care of its own can not be questioned any more than the right of a man to take care of his family—and that is not questioned. I do not suppose that there is any sentiment anywhere in this country against the proposition that I have enunciated, that if we think it is for our interest to restrict immigration from the greatest nation in the world, or the smallest, we have the right to do it, doing it in such a way, of course, as to give as little offense as possible. So in dealing with China, I admit that we should give the Chinese Government as little offense as possible.

I concede that there is some force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, that in dealing with a question of this kind we should deal with it not in haste, that we should take reasonable time to determine what our duty may be to ourselves and to this nation.

A few days ago I had reason, I thought, to complain a little (if a man could complain in this body of another body) of the action of the House of Representatives. If I could not complain of the action of that House and could not criticise it, I could at least say that its course with regard to this bill was most remarkable. I did say, and I repeat, that it was a most remarkable proceeding, of which I understand I have no right to complain, but to which at least I may have the right to refer.

In the morning hour, as soon as the Journal had been read, a distinguished politician for whom I have nothing but the kindest feelings and of whom I do not wish to say an unkind word, a man distinguished for his political connection with the present political campaign, rose and presented this bill. That he should be the author of a bill that should pass the House of Representatives in thirty minutes from the time it was read and should come here in hot haste within an hour after it had passed that body is somewhat remarkable. I had occasion to say that I thought it was sent here for a purpose. I am speaking now of outside influences that induced this; I am not speaking of inside influences.

It seems to be an open secret that this bill originated in the minds of persons not in the House of Representatives, but outside of it.

That matter has been adverted to here and has never been denied that I know of; but I would like to say that I will myself, so far as my belief goes, exonerate the present Secretary of State individually from having had any connection with that transaction. I want to say that, because, while I think he has made many mistakes as Secretary of State, I believe he has too high a sense of honor and too high a sense of the importance and the dignity of his position to engage in that himself. But others did engage in it, officials or non-officials connected with the campaign that is being fought now, and the very purpose for which it was done can be seen by an extract that I will now read from a Democratic paper, published in the city of New York, on the 8th day of this month, called the Globe. The article is headed "The Chinese Question," and reads as follows:

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Both Democrats and Republicans have manifested a keen anxiety to be first to take advantage of the rejection by the Chinese Emperor of the treaty which has been lately negotiated between that country and the United States, and to use the opportunity in such way as to win the anti-Chinese vote by proposing the most vigorous laws for the exclusion of the Chinese from this country.

The Democrats have been too quick for their adversaries, for, on Saturday, before it was officially known that China had refused to ratify the treaty, Mr. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, a member of the Democratic national committee, and the President's most intimate friend, asked the unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to introduce for immediate consideration a bill supplemental to an act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to the Chinese. No one on either side of the House dared to interpose an objection, and by unanimous consent the bill was introduced.

I presume everybody recognizes the truth of that statement, even to the assertion, perhaps, that nobody "dared to interpose an objection." It was undoubtedly hoped in certain quarters that objection might be interposed, provided it came from the right direction.

I have something further to read on that subject. I find in the proceedings of the House of Representatives on last Thursday that a distinguished member of the national Democratic committee, speaking of myself, said:

The gentleman asks what right had I to introduce such a bill.

I never did, Mr. President.

I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have an extract read from yesterday's Post.

The Clerk read at follows:

"A FLOOD OF CHINESE LABOR.

"OTTAWA, ONTARIO, September 4."

I call the attention of the Senate now to this, because while it does not justify this bill, it will show the necessity, perhaps, of other and further legislation; and if this bill should get into the Committee on Foreign Relations, it will show the necessity of an amendment to this bill.

"During the past week five hundred and eighty-four Chinese arrived at Vancouver, B. C., from China. It is evident their destination is the United States. An officer of the Dominion Government just returned from British Columbia stated that there is a steady stream of Chinese floating around that province into Washington Territory. In this way during the present year it is estimated the Chinese population of British Columbia has already been depleted to the extent of five thousand. The minister of customs, who is now on the Pacific coast investigating the Chinese question, has promised to look into the matter for the United States authorities."

That is an extract from the Washington Post of the 5th of this present month. The speaker then continues:

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the answer to the Senator from Colorado as to the necessity and urgency of action by this House to immediately put a stop to the coming in of this Chinese labor; and, sir, this Democratic House did not require three days to find out whether they would pass that bill or not; it was passed in thirty minutes.

When this bill was before the House of Representatives it undoubtedly passed in the time mentioned. I have made a little calculation, and it seems to me it could probably not have taken thirty minutes from the time it was introduced until it was passed.

How does it happen that in a body in which it is so difficult for any member to get the floor and catch the Speaker's eye, he who this Democratic paper says stands so close to the Chief Executive, and is so influential in Democratic circles, could so readily catch the Speaker's eye? Nobody on his side objected, although everybody knew that this Administration had sent here a treaty that all the friends of the Administration, without exception, voted for, and that this was an infraction of the treaty or a repeal of at least a portion of it. How could it happen if it was not understood in circles influential that this bill was to pass? It was not to be gainsaid that the bill was to pass.

Was it hoped that objection would be raised in this body? Was that hoped by outsiders? Of course I can not presume that any member of the House of Representatives would so suppose. But was it supposed by people outside that when this bill reached this body, noted for its conservatism, its attention to details, and its desire that there shall be nothing done in an undignified manner, nothing done with indecent haste, was it hoped and expected that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who is a prominent Republican of national reputation, would rise in his place and say: "Mr. President, that bill must go to the Committee on Foreign Relations?" Then it would have been said everywhere: "Thirty minutes the bill took to pass the Democratic House, but it is tied up and hung up in a Republican Senate." Was that the purpose?

It does not take a very vivid imagination to believe that in certain quarters that was the idea. And I may say here, while I always favored this kind of legislation and while I have always insisted that it was meet and proper and just to legislate without reference to a treaty, I myself was almost inclined to say that decency and proper regard for the Senate itself required that this bill should go to a committee. But I thought that if the men who were supporting this Administration and who had defended its recent treaty could sit here and see this bill taken up and passed—a bill which they had not seen in print—we who had been clamoring for this legislation because we realized (as they did not) the alarming necessity for it, if they could submit, I could on my part.

I want to speak of this bill which I suppose is now to be claimed by the members of the Democratic national committee to be of such immense value. When the bill was before the House, Mr. BLAND, of Missouri, said:

There has been great complaint about Chinese coming across the border from the British possessions. I would like to ask whether any provision is made as to that?

Mr. SCOTT. This covers the whole field.

Mr. MORROW, of California. This does not protect us against the emigration from the British possessions.

Mr. MCSHANE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SCOTT. It does very carefully.

Mr. DUNN. The bill seems to be very carefully drawn to cover the whole ground.

Why, Mr. President, that affords further proof that the bill did not meet any criticism from those who ought to have known, and who did probably know, what it contained, or who professed to know what it contained, but the bill contains nothing of that character at all. If the action was instigated or hurried by what appeared in the Post of last Wednesday it was ill done.

This bill does not provide at all for the evil they are complaining of, and it could not have been that that was the moving cause, outside or inside, or anywhere, for the passage of this bill to prevent the Chinese from coming across into the United States from British Columbia, for it is absolutely silent on that subject and deals only with the Chinamen who have been here and who have gone out of here and who seek to return by virtue of the provisions of the statute of 1882 and statutes subsequent thereto.

When the bill got here, as I was saying, it came very near going to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That suggestion was made and nobody objected. That suggestion was made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. Twice he made the suggestion that it ought to go to the committee. As I said the other day, when he concluded, in my judgment, that some political advantage would be taken of his side of the Chamber if he sent the bill to the committee or if he suggested such a course, he withdrew the suggestion, and then nobody was found here to propose that it go to the committee. Why? It had come here for political purposes and both sides knew that it had come here for political purposes. I can say for myself that I did not propose to fall into the pit which had been dug for me or for mine.

When the bill got here the Democratic party was in the condition to which the sweet singer of Israel refers when he speaks of his enemy who had attempted great things against him. He said:

He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made.
His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. (Psalms, VII, 15, 16.)

The rhymster put in rhyme this idea when he said:

He digged a pit,
He digged it deep,
He digged it for his brother;
But for his sin
He did fall in
The pit he digged for another.

[Laughter.]

That, Mr. President, was the condition of the Democratic party. The other day, when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] came to its rescue after we had agreed to vote, after there had been an agreement made here, which I admit is not binding in law, but which we have uniformly since I have been a member of this body adhered to—when the Senator from Maryland came in and wanted to move to send this to a committee, he was allowed to do it, I confess properly, rightfully, because such an agreement is not binding upon anybody, it is not a legal agreement, it is not an order of the Senate.

Therefore I did not question the right of the President of the Senate to receive the motion. On that motion there were 17 votes in favor of sending the bill to the committee. Fourteen of those votes were from the Democratic side and 3 from the Republican side. On a subsequent vote, there being no quorum, the relation was about the same. I think it stood just the same; but, however, whether it did or not, the question then came whether the Senate should adjourn. The Democrats of this body all at once got new light; where they got it from I do not know. The bill had been here, and we had heard nothing from any Department of the Government until it was called out by the resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], when we received a message saying that the executive department of the Government had no official information except that which they transmitted to us, which was that it was once reported that the treaty had been rejected, and the next time that the treaty had been postponed for further deliberation.

Then came the question of voting. Whatever delay there has been has been occasioned by the Democrats of this body. I do not say that they have not a right, and that they ought not to so vote, but I do say that it will not do for the members of the Democratic national committee anywhere to assert that the House of Representatives put this bill through in thirty minutes, and that we were a week or ten days (or whatever the time may be) in passing this bill through the Senate. The bill has received practically the unanimous support of the Senate. The Senate is committed, as I said in the opening of my remarks, to the doctrine that the American people reserve to themselves the right, independent of treaty, to say who shall and who shall not come here. The vote was cast after we were as morally certain as we could be that the treaty had not been rejected. Whether the motive for the vote, then, has been good or bad, there has been a step forward taken in the interest of good government, there has been a step forward taken in what I believe to be a just and proper assertion on the part of the Government that it has the right under all circumstances to say for itself, untrammeled by treaties, who shall and who shall not come into this country.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to continue my remarks on this subject. I would only say with regard to the discussion that has taken place here to-day by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that I stated six years and more ago in this body that the Chinese question could not be properly discussed in this body with open doors. No man knows the difficulties involved in this question who has not been brought in contact with it and who has not seen it. The Chinese are not free men as we understand free men; they are not laborers as we understand laborers; they are not the class of men with whom we express sympathy day by day. They are not such men as compose the great mass of society in this country who labor and who create. They are foreigners to our soil, and intend so to remain. They are not only foreigners to our soil, but foreigners to our institutions, and intend so to remain. They are not merely foreigners to our institutions, but they are the opponents of our institutions and hostile to them. They are hostile to our religion as well as to our civilization.

I repeat, sir, that if the great mass of people in the East have not wakened up to the evil of Chinese immigration, it is because they have not been brought in contact with it, because they have not considered, because they have not thought, because they have not read, and have not familiarized themselves with the subject. These people have no part and no lot with us. They pay no taxes, they have no homes, they have no wives, they have no children; they contribute nothing locally to the wealth of the State; they contribute nothing to the wealth of the nation; they contribute nothing in any shape to the community in which they live except the cheap labor which they give, and that is dearly bought, Mr. President, when you take into account the evils which follow their residence in every land.

The Sandwich Islands, which a few years ago were the fairest portion of the earth, and held a people remarkable for their physical beauty and for their intellectual strength, although uneducated, will in a generation be depopulated, and there will not be a single native left, because when brought into contact with Chinese they became diseased and destroyed to such an extent that in one generation more there will not be a full-blooded Sandwich Islander on the face of the earth.

We can no more come in contact with them without our degradation than can the Sandwich Islander. We can no more come in contact with them without having our labor degraded than we can with the wild African. And, as the Senator from Nevada has said, when they came into California they drove out the young men and the young women from all the ordinary avenues of trade, from all opportunities. Wherever the Chinamen went all chance departed from the young men and women of that State who had not had the good fortune to receive a superior education. In every community there will always be some people who by their unfortunate situation will be compelled to take work that other men will decline. They do not, however, lack the ability to do well the work which falls to their lot; but the Chinaman will drive that class of men out. He has driven the American girl out of the kitchen; nay, he has driven all classes of people, whether American or foreign, save his own countrymen, from that class of labor on the Pacific coast.

The Chinamen monopolize every class of labor that is ready to the hand of the poor and the weak and the unfortunate of the country—men and women. More than that, Mr. President, I repeat, is the degradation that comes to labor of the presence of these people in California and other States. You can not get the high-spirited Caucasian to labor by the side of the Chinaman, although he may be willing to labor for the same wages. He never will do it. And thus the Chinese are not simply taking the bread from the mouths of our laborers, but they are compelling them to be brought up in idleness, and in vice, and in crime.

There is a fearful account to be laid at the door of every man who fails to understand this question, since it has been so publicly advertised and discussed as it has been within the last two or three years. There is a fearful account to be laid at the door of every legislator who has failed to legislate in the interest of the laboring men, not alone in California but in all portions of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire simply to correct a misapprehension into which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has fallen with reference to the scope and extent of the bill now under consideration.

The Senator said that this bill made no provision whatever for the prevention of the return of Chinese laborers from the British dominions. I will read from the bill for the purpose of showing that the Senator has made a serious mistake as to that. The first section of the bill is in the following words:

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been or may now or hereafter be a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to or remain in the United States.

That language is broad and general, and refers to every Chinese laborer who having once resided in the United States had departed from the United States, whether he went to China or to any other country.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he understood me to say that that was not the case?

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to say that no provision was made in the bill to prevent the return of Chinese laborers from the British dominions.

Mr. TELLER. These laborers of whom I spoke and of whom the Post spoke have never been here. They are the Chinamen that are coming now. They have no certificates.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the criticism of the Senator is ill-timed and inappropriate. This bill does not pretend to make any provision whatever for or against the introduction of any Chinese into this country for the first time.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I said. That is all. That was my criticism of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not prohibit their coming for the first time, because by a prior law in force on the statute-book, unquestioned, there is a provision covering a prohibition for a period of ten years, which was the longest time that a Republican President would allow us to make a prohibition, that President having vetoed the twenty years' prohibition. That provision is now in force, and prohibits absolutely the coming of Chinese to this country from any quarter whatever for the first time.

This bill is a supplement to that act. It does not pretend to deal with that question, because Congress had dealt with it and there was an absolute prohibition decreed for the balance of the term of ten years remaining after the year 1884, extending to 1894. That excludes all original introduction of Chinese.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to make a suggestion at this point for his consideration and that of the Senator from Colorado?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. If it is on that point, yes; because that is all I desire to engage the attention of the Senate upon.

Mr. HOAR. It may be an important consideration for whoever shall deal with this bill hereafter. This bill is entitled "A supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882."

Those treaty stipulations are stipulations made with the Government of China, and no other; and of course an act which is designed to execute those stipulations would be interpreted in the light of the treaty. The question came up in the city of Boston and was argued before two very eminent judges, one of them Judge Lowell, of the circuit court, who is known throughout the country, the author of the Lowell bankruptcy bill, so called, not now upon the bench, a gentleman who I believe is a supporter of the present President, and Mr. Justice Nelson, of the district court, who is still upon the bench, and also a very able, learned, and intelligent judge. I would like to ask the attention of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Nevada to this statement.

The question was raised whether the term "Chinese," used in the existing legislation prohibiting the introduction of certain persons, described them by race, whether it was a term designating the race to which they belonged or a term designating the country to which they belonged; and those learned judges, gentlemen of different politics, held (in a habeas corpus case, I think it was) that as the act was entitled an act to execute this treaty its provisions must be construed as describing the Chinese as countrymen, as citizens of a certain empire with which the treaty had been made, and not persons belonging to a certain race, and therefore that a Chinese person who came from Canton or Hong-Kong, or whatever other place it might be in the British possessions——

Mr. TELLER. Being a British subject.

Mr. HOAR. Being a British subject, was not within the terms of this legislation. When that matter was made a subject of discussion here two or three years ago, it was misunderstood somewhat by some Senator, who adverted to this decision of these judges, and I explained it to the Senate. I stated the ground on which that decision went as I have stated it now. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], said in his place that it seemed to him the decision of these judges was entirely right.

Mr. TELLER. Who said that?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. Whether that decision is right or wrong I have not any occasion now to say.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is aware that Mr. Justice Field decided otherwise.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it was decided otherwise on the Pacific coast and by very eminent judges there; but what I have to say is that in the face of the adjudication of such eminent jurists as those I have described, and in the face of the opinion expressed in the Senate of the United States by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who is also a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and holds an influential place in the Senate, it seems to me that the friends of this legislation would be extremely rash if they passed a new bill subject to the same doubt.

It would be pretty difficult, I suggest to my honorable friend from Colorado, to deal with the matter of the coming of persons of the Chinese race from British Columbia. They come from the British Empire. They come from the territory of a power which has very numerous subjects of the Chinese race. The presumption would certainly be, or would be very likely to be claimed, at any rate, that they were British subjects.

So the bill is not only deficient in the particular which the Senator from Colorado has pointed out, but opens also this very much larger door, or the opportunity, at any rate, to make this claim.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Mississippi for taking so much time in the statement which I have made.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. That draws me to a point which I had not intended to present to the Senate, but as the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts are very easily answered, as the doubts and difficulties which he has, whilst they might properly have arisen under the act of 1882 are clearly taken away and removed by the act of 1884, and as it would take no time to answer him, I propose to do it simply by reading from the act of 1884. The act of 1884 at the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate reads as follows:

Section 15 of said act—

That is the act of 1882, and I believe I will read it now, so that the Senate may understand the pertinency of the amendment made in 1884. Section 15 of the original act of 1882 read as follows:

That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

In 1884, I presume on account of difficulties and doubts suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, when the Senate came to amend the act of 1882 it made section 15 read as follows:

That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China—

If it had stopped there the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts would have existed; but it goes further, and this is the material amendment of the act of 1882 which removes all grounds for doubt or dispute on that subject—and Chinese, whether subjects of China or any other foreign power.

Under the act of 1884, notwithstanding any doubts which may have arisen under the act of 1882, it is clear that the exclusion of Chinese is not an exclusion merely of the subjects of China, but an exclusion of all persons of the Chinese race, "whether subjects of China or any other foreign power." Therefore the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts does not exist.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me just a moment to call his attention to section 6 of that same act? The Senator will find that section 6 of the act of 1884, in providing for the certificates, provides for a class of certificates which shall be issued to persons who are not subjects of China, which confirms what the Senator has just stated.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; that is a confirmation. Now I will go back.

I did not intend to take the time of the Senate long, but the interruption, as the Senator from Massachusetts himself confessed, was rather lengthy, and as I have shown, was wholly unnecessary and was based upon a very unsubstantial and shadowy foundation, and one which has been removed entirely by the legislation of this country.

Now I come to answer the Senator from Colorado, as I was proceeding to answer him when I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Colorado insists that the bill now before the Senate does not exclude the original immigration of Chinese. I admit that it does not exclude original Chinese immigration.

Mr. TELLER. Very well; we do not disagree then.

Mr. GEORGE. I answer that by saying that there is in my hand an act passed by Congress in 1884, the first section of which I shall read, which does exclude the introduction originally of Chinese:

That from and after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended, and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come from any foreign port or place, or having so come to remain within the United States.

So there was and is upon the statute-book a complete, an efficient, and a thorough provision for the exclusion of Chinese when they first attempt to come. In that act, however, in accordance with the treaty made by President Arthur, there was a provision that those who came here and went away might return.

That is the way the law stood, and that is the way the law stands now. When this proposed act was passed by the House of Representatives they found that the first or original immigration of a Chinese laborer was absolutely prohibited by law.

Mr. TELLER. For how long?

Mr. GEORGE. For the period of ten years; just exactly as long as a Republican President would allow us to make it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Ten years from the 6th of May, 1882?

Mr. GEORGE. It says ten years "from and after the passage of this act." However, that makes no difference; for the present they are excluded. So when the other House came to deal with this subject they found only one door open by which a Chinese laborer could enter the United States, and that was the door left open in pursuance of our treaty stipulations with China, left open by the act of 1882, and left open also by the act of 1884, which permitted Chinese laborers who have once come here and departed from this country to return.

That, then, was the evil. No other Chinamen could come here under the law; and when the other House proceeded to deal with this question they dealt only with the evil then existing, and provided for shutting the only other door that was left open, and that, as I said the other day, in direct violation of the treaty stipulation with China.

That, I believe, is an answer to what the Senator from Colorado said.

Mr. TELLER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I am through.

Mr. TELLER. I called attention to the character of the bill for two purposes: first, to show that it did not deal with the whole subject, but more particularly to what is said to have been the pressing necessity of the bill, that Chinamen who never had been here were coming in vast quantities from British Columbia to the United States. I called attention to the fact that the bill does not deal with that subject at all, and that could not have been the moving cause, or if it was, it has certainly miscarried, and that is an afterthought. Somebody thought of that afterwards; but at the midnight conference at which this bill was arranged it was not suggested, because it had not yet appeared in the public press, and therefore that could not have been the reason why the measure was brought before Congress. I called attention to the provisions of the bill to show that the bill does not contain any such thing.

Mr. GEORGE. If I have learned anything in my profession—and I am sure that the Senator from Colorado from his eminence in it has learned it as I have learned it—it is that the object of a statute can not be made out by reading from the newspapers. The object of a statute is gathered alone from the terms of the statute itself.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I say, and that is why I complain that parties are citing the newspapers to support the reason why they want this legislation and complain of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the Senator from Colorado, if he will allow me, complains that the House of Representatives has not squared its conduct in the passage of this bill by the outgivings of some newspapers.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no; I do not. I understand that outside of the House of Representatives it is asserted that the bill was brought in because the Chinese were coming over from British Columbia. I say there was no such reason for it.

THE CHINESE TREATY.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate as early as convenient all correspondence or communications by and with the Government of the United States concerning the treaty with China recently ratified by the Senate, including all communications which have passed between the State Department and our minister to China or any other representative or agent of the United States in China or elsewhere with reference to said treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The report was concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to reconsider the vote by which the Chinese restriction bill was passed.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] desires to address the Senate on this subject, and it is late, and we had better not attempt to take a vote to-night.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 12, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

MRS. LOUISA V. DE KILPATRICK.

The SPEAKER. The bill (S. 1488) granting an increase of pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, United States Volunteers, with House amendments disagreed to by the Senate, and a conference requested thereon, has reached the stage where it is privileged; and if there be no objection, the House will insist on its amendments and agree to the conference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the said bill Mr. CHIPMAN, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. PAYSON.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. TRACEY as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and on the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill called up by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] has a portion of his time remaining, as the present occupant of the chair understands, which he reserved.

Mr. SYMES. I control something like three-quarters of an hour of the extended time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. By unanimous consent an agreement was reached by which a certain extension of time was allowed, and a portion of that is still under the control of the gentleman from Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair is advised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who has kept a list of the time, that something like an hour remains on each side.

The gentleman from Missouri, who has occupied the chair heretofore during the discussion of this bill, had better resume it.

[Mr. DOCKERY here took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.]

Mr. FORNEY. I yield twenty minutes of the time remaining to this side to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the appropriation suggested by the Senate amendment has been rendered somewhat uncertain by various suggestions on the part of different gentlemen who have occupied the floor during the discussion. It is a matter of very great importance for us to ascertain whether or not it is proposed that we are to go forward making these surveys with a view to locating the basins and reservoirs, whereupon the operations of the Government in that direction are to cease, or whether we propose, having gone thus far, that we shall go into the construction of the reservoirs and canals themselves. Now, sir, I have the opinion of Mr. Powell, who is at the head of this Survey, and who is likely to come in contact with the various individuals and to encounter the various thoughts connected with it, and who is more likely to present to us the true situation than any gentleman who has made suggestions or embodied them in the debate which has taken place on this bill. That gentleman, in an examination had before the Senate Committee on Appropriaions, in considering the very matter to which I am now calling your attention, uses this language:

Two methods have been presented, and there are two parties in Congress and two parties about the country as to the best method of utilizing that land for irrigation.

I call attention to this language, "two parties in Congress and two parties about the country." This matter of discussion is not one of mere essay. These thoughts are thrust into the legislation and legislative debate by practical men for practical purposes, and the Superintendent of the Geological Survey tells you that they debate two schemes. What are these schemes? He says:

It should first be understood that all the land within that area—that is, 14 or 15 per cent. of the country which is to be redeemed—can only be redeemed by the utilization of large capital. To build the headworks, canals, and reservoirs necessary to do this work large capital must be used. The experience of the world is very full upon that. The British system is for the General Government to irrigate in India and in other countries, but especially in India, by the General Government building the headworks, canals, and reservoirs, and taxing the people by collecting tolls. The British Government has in India irrigated about 3,000,000 acres of land in this manner within three years. The British Government, in the prosecution of that plan, has done all the work itself. It maintains the canals, reservoirs, and headworks; it employs a little army of officials who are supervisors of irrigation, and it taxes the land to pay the maintenance of the irrigation works, to pay for the supervision of irrigation, and to pay 4½ per cent. on the original plant; so that the income of the British Government from India is chiefly from tolls on its irrigating canals. The plan is that those tolls shall make an income of 4½ per cent. after paying the current cost of maintenance and the cost of supervision.

Then he recurs to the Spanish system:

The system of Spain was originally to grant to individuals and corporations the right to take out water. That is not accompanied with the tenure of the land, but it was the right to take out water and to sell water to individuals. The Spanish system did not give the land, but only the right to the water. In the main that was usually the case, but it had the further condition that after a term of years, usually thirty-nine years, but variously in different portions of the country, sometimes fifty years and sometimes even a hundred years, the right to that water was yielded by the company.

Now, if we are to regard the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Geological Survey, and persons who keep moving forward and agitating the question of irrigating the public lands we will find, as these extracts show, that they have in mind one of two systems—the British plan, which is to make the policy of irrigating the public lands afford a system of revenue to the Government by the building of reservoirs and lakes, and then by canals irrigating the lands and deriving therefrom, by a tax or toll upon the landholders, a revenue for the Government; or by the Spanish system of letting the right out to individuals or corporations by contract, that is, allowing the work to be done under contract. If this be true, and I take it that there can be no doubt, when we come to look at the case it is a grave question for us to consider before embarking upon either plan or giving our sanction to it. Permit me just here, however, to call attention to the opinion of a distinguished gentleman from the Northwest, who uses this language in this same report; I refer now to one of the Senators from Nevada.

The difficulty we meet here is utter ignorance in Congress of what we have and what we want the appropriation for. It is to survey these districts and make the reservoirs, so that irrigation will be possible, and then we can discuss how the people can manage them.

So that at the other end of the Capitol the views and opinions of the head of the Geological Survey are confirmed by one of the Senators and other persons connected with that body, which indicates that the real intent of this whole appropriation is that the Government shall itself enter upon the work of constructing these reservoirs.

Now, then, what does that mean? I read further from the report of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate:

Q. You have told us of the cost of the surveys, the location of the reservoirs, the segregation of the irrigable lands, and the establishment of catchment districts. Suppose all that is done and completed—take for illustration the upper waters of the Missouri—what would the cost of the construction of the reservoirs and canals be, in your judgment? What would be the range of cost? You have never gone into that subject.

A. I have never gone into that; that is outside of my work. It would be an enormous sum in the aggregate.

Q. Nobody, so far as you know, has entered into any calculation of the cost of that work?

A. No, sir.

Go on with these surveys if you will, Mr. Speaker, locate your reservoirs, locate your catchment basins at a cost of over $5,000,000, and when you have made that expenditure you are told by the highest authority that we can have that it is all worthless unless you go forward and construct these reservoirs and canals by resorting to sources where large capital is to be had either of corporations or of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will it disturb the gentleman if I ask him a question there?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will hear you.

Mr. TAULBEE. I simply wanted to ask if this $5,000,000 was for the survey and location of these reservoirs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I so stated.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not catch that statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. My statement was that the cost of making surveys and locating the catchment basins and the reservoirs would amount to more than $5,000,000, and we are informed that after that expenditure it would all be worthless unless we went further and constructed the reservoirs and canals at an expense to the Federal Treasury, or permitted contracts to be made with great corporations and large capitalists.

Mr. TAULBEE. Whose statement was it you read?

Mr. BLOUNT. I read from the report made to the United States Senate by Mr. ALLISON, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TAULBEE. What part of it?

Mr. BLOUNT. Among the other witnesses is the testimony of Major Powell, and I will read from him:

Mr. POWELL. If those catchment basins were defined—if the areas that waters could be stored were fixed and the area to which water was to be applied was determined—within one year $200,000,000 would be offered by capitalists to do that work. It is one of the most inviting investments that can be made.

By Mr. HALE:

Q. In what form would capital enter into the work?
A. To construct the reservoirs.
The CHAIRMAN. Corporations?
Mr. HALE. Would corporations construct the reservoirs for the toll they would get?
Mr. TELLER. We have $15,000,000 invested in irrigating ditches in Colorado.
Mr. POWELL. You have I do not know how many bills before the present Congress asking for those rights. The capital of this country is ready to be poured right into that work.

The Superintendent of the Geological Survey declares that we have a great number of bills pending before both bodies of Congress in the interest of corporations for locating these reservoirs to make the contracts for the purpose of furnishing water to these lands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been stated in the course of debate that at this very session, during the month of May, a joint resolution had passed Congress providing for a topographical survey of the section in question. That joint resolution, I apprehend, attracted very little of the attention of this House or the Senate or the committees which respectively recommended it to the several bodies. Why do I say so, sir? Simply because the law now provides for that very thing; simply because by virtue of the law existing prior to the passage of that joint resolution more than $1,000,000 have been expended in the very line indicated by that resolution. In this same paper from which I have quoted, Mr. BECK asked:

Q. What do those large blue blocks indicate?
A. That is the survey which has been already made. We have already done something.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is the nature of that map?
A. It is topographical and geographical both, but for the purpose here, topographical.

By Mr. HALE:

Q. Bearing upon the question of irrigation?
A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What are those yellow lines?
A. [Indicating.] That is work which was done by Wheeler; that by Hayden, and this by Clarence King, where we have rough maps of the country comparatively, but where a part of the work is already done.
Q. Is the topography all done?
A. The topography is not done sufficiently; it is done for the general map of the country, but not for all the irrigable districts.
Mr. TELLER. That is, you mean, in King's work.
Mr. POWELL. In King's work.
Mr. STEWART. Is the work which has been done in such shape that in laying the topography it is sufficiently definite, so that you can connect your work and show where the reservoirs, etc., ought to be made?
Mr. POWELL. I shall come to that directly. All the blue area I have mapped and colored on the map is irrigable area, as you see, one about Salt Lake City [indicating].

By Mr. HALE:

Q. What does the red represent?
A. The irrigable areas.

Sir, I might go on with quotation after quotation from this report showing that a very large area has already been surveyed with the view of locating the catchment basins and reservoirs as proposed by this appropriation.

Then, sir, there is nothing in the passage of that resolution which binds this Congress de novo to the inauguration of a system of topographic surveys.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Can the gentleman tell us where that survey to which he refers was made?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will hand the gentleman the paper. He knows that I have not time to stop and investigate the matter for him.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I thought you knew where the survey was made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, then, Mr. Speaker, is this increase of appropriation made? Is it to facilitate the work of those surveys? That is all that can come from it. There are some of us, Mr. Speaker, who have felt that one of the greatest wants of this country was the reduction of taxation, that our people were carrying in time of peace a burden belonging to the war period. There are some of us who have felt that if the rates of taxation are to be reduced there should be a corresponding effort on the part of legislators to aid in that purpose by economy in Federal expenditures. Sir, he who thinks that he can waste the public treasure and reduce the taxation of the country at the same time, deceives no man save himself. I hold in my hand volume 20 of the Statutes at Large, providing for the Geological Survey, and consolidating various other surveys, for the purpose, as was alleged, of economizing expenditures in that direction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to have ten minutes more.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, at the time this consolidation was made the expenditures for the Geological Survey were $106,000, and the head of this bureau himself was the chief advocate for the consolidation on the ground of economy, and yet from $106,000 in 1880 the expenditures of this survey have gone on increasing until they reached in the last fiscal year $675,240.

The sundry civil bill which the House passed at this session provides for the continuation of the various surveys, this topographical one among the others, at a cost of $677,000. Not content with that the Senate has added $250,000, and now, if this amendment shall be agreed to by the House, we shall have an appropriation in this bill for the Geological Survey of $927,000. I repeat, the expenditure for this purpose has gone up from $106,000 in 1880 to $927,000 if this amendment shall become a law. Sir, there is no branch of the public service along the whole line where expenditures have grown with such vigor and extravagance as in this particular bureau. But the same tendency is found in all Departments and bureaus. Take the Fish Commission, which fourteen years ago was expending only $15,000 or $25,000, we find that it now expends $400,000.

I might go on and enumerate others to illustrate the way in which, gradually yet rapidly, we have increased the expenditures of the Government, and I say that this very Congress, these very honest gentlemen right around me, and myself as culpably as any, have permitted expenditures to be increased to an unwarranted extent, while at the same time we have been preaching in favor of reducing taxation. Now, the people will not be deceived by this. In every man's affairs, Mr. Speaker, there is but one way of reducing expenditures, there is but one way of economizing, and that is by doing it.

You can theorize as much as you please about your private bank account, what the balance ought to be; but unless you forego certain expenditures your theories and your calculations are silly. I well remember that in the Forty-fourth Congress, when the work of reducing expenditures was undertaken by the Democratic majority in this House, a distinguished gentleman, a man of honor and of high character, a man of public spirit, a man of large knowledge of public affairs, who afterwards became Vice-President of the United States, and who has now passed away from the stage of action, Mr. Wheeler, of New York, sympathizing with the disposition of the majority of the House at that time in the matter of reducing public expenditure, said:

The heads of Departments will not help you to reduce; the bureaus will not help you to reduce; no man having charge of the expenditure of these funds will help you; the only way to reduce expenditures is to reduce them.

And unless this side of the House has the nerve to make expenditures on a moderate scale, keeping in mind the purpose of reducing taxation, the judgment of the country upon us will be one of scorn and contempt.

Mr. Speaker, we have been entertained by some gentlemen who indulge themselves in literary researches, and who have gone back into centuries past and told us what Egypt and China did, what Spain and France and various other countries have done in reclaiming desert areas and improving the public lands. Asia, with her deserts, with her crowded population, ignorant, starving in vast numbers, Spain, an old, wornout dynasty, with restricted territory and crowded population, Italy and other countries with like conditions, are held up as the examples for our guidance. Sir, I feel thankful that I have been born in a land where nature has been bountiful in supplying us with cheap lands sufficient for our people for centuries to come, so that we need resort to no schemes of taxation like the English system, charging tolls for water. Nature has so provided for us that we need not resort to the system of Spain by putting this supply in the hands of corporations, to be doled out to the people. We have millions of fertile acres for the laboring classes to resort to, in an agreeable climate with abundance of water, and all the favorable conditions for human life and human happiness. We have a people who are not pushing forward to desert lands, but who are bearing a system of taxation which could not have grown up except in a state of gigantic civil war.

From a consideration of the desert lands I turn to the pledges this side of the House has made in the matter of expenditure; I turn to its pledges in behalf of reduction of taxation, and I beg my associates on this floor that, if their record as a party, if their proclamations to the country are not silly mockery, they will observe moderation in voting away the public money.

Will you say that the proposed expenditure here is but $250,000? Sir, the great bulk of our expenditures is made up of little items. It is by the aggregations of details that your millions are piled up and your high rates of taxation made necessary. Unless we can get down to the consideration of these matters in a business-like way, the record we shall make will be anything but creditable or attractive.

I have heard the argument here that we should not count dollars, that we should have broad ideas, should take in the whole country, should feel that there is no limit to the public resources. I have high respect personally for gentlemen who utter these sentiments; but I must say that such is the cry we have heard from corporations and subsidy-hunters of every kind, as they infest this Capitol. They are the leaders in this cry, as heard here and in the press all over the land. The plain laboring people have no sympathy with such a sentiment; and though I may have the misfortune not to be classed with those gentlemen of large ideas, I prefer so to act as to keep myself in sympathy with the great masses of the people who have to economize in order to maintain themselves, and who are asking for a reduction of taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if I understand this amendment, it seeks to accomplish two things which are to my mind of great importance. The first is to expend a small sum of money (I do not care if you make it smaller—I would as soon have an appropriation of $25,000 as $250,000) in commencing the survey of sites for reservoirs in the mountains, looking to some time in the future when either by the Government or by private citizens under the authority of the Government, measures shall be taken to irrigate the land. That is one branch of the question. The next branch, and by far the most important—in fact the important proposition of this amendment—is the reservation, now at the time of the passage of the law, of lands that may hereafter be needed at any time for reservoirs or for irrigating canals, and all lands that may be irrigated by virtue of the establishment of reservoirs hereafter.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Would it not be practicable to make a reservation of these locations suitable for pooling or reservoir purposes, so as to save them from the hands of speculators according to the talk we have heard here, without any appropriation whatever?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly. So far as that is concerned, I have no doubt it is practicable. The conferees would understand that as the House understands it. I have no objection to a small appropriation to commence these surveys now; I think perhaps such an appropriation would be wise. But that is a matter of but little importance. The main thing is the reservation. Otherwise, as we are told by gentlemen here, and as I believe from my little knowledge of the Western country, these sites will be taken up under your land laws in one way or another by private speculators; and in that event those who are to follow us will turn round and condemn us for our want of wisdom and prudent legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard much of economy. I have heard much of objection from one standpoint and another. One gentleman says that this proposed measure will not stop the floods of the Mississippi; another man says it will be expensive. I do not know whether it will stop the floods of the Mississippi or not. I live in a district which, so far as I know, has never had one dollar of money expended in it for any public improvement of any kind. I think I represent an intelligent constituency; and when gentlemen seek to oppose this proposition by attacks such as the gentleman from Alabama indulged in, they should recollect that this country stands or falls as a whole. As well might a citizen or a Representative living a thousand miles inland say that we shall have no coast fortifications, no river and harbor improvements, that there shall be no money expended to protect the people directly or indirectly in what is soon to be an empire along the great Mississippi Valley. I have no such narrow-minded constituency, thank God! No man can journey over that Western country and see something of the great watershed and the great mountains and the vast stretches of land—the best land anywhere, if you can put water upon it—without feeling that it is the part of statesmanship to take a step of this kind now, whether it costs $10,000, $500,000, or $5,000,000.

There will be people who believe these reservoirs are a great national object, necessary for the Government to take hold of. If we do not make the reservations people who follow after us will have to remove the hand of monopoly from the key of the situation. Go along the rivers out West now, and under the land law you find the monopolist and speculator owning the water privileges. If we had had proper legislation that would not have been the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Colorado to yield me a few minutes longer.

Mr. SYMES. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to see my honored friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] rise in his place and discuss this question not on its merit, as he is competent to do, and I have great respect for him, but he flew off on the question of expenditure. Oh, my friend, the people of this country are not afraid of the expenditure of money for great national objects, honestly and justly made. That is the kind of expenditure they want. They are not afraid of taxation to raise money for such expenditure.

But I will say to my friend that you can draw a broad line of distinction between expenditures of this class and expenditures I am sorry to say this and the last Congress have made for mere increases of salaries, and mere increases of official place—the mere swelling of great Departments like the Post-Office Department, I think under the lead of my friend from Georgia, in many cases unwisely and extravagantly done. That is the kind of expenditure they object to. They do not object to proper expenditures from one ocean to the other or from the northern to the southern boundary. They are a liberal, wise, and far-seeing people. When you look over these multiplied millions of acres, from fifty to a hundred millions of acres, which can be reclaimed, if not in our time, in that of our children or grand-children if we make these reservations and make them now, I say that it is almost akin to a misdemeanor on our part to fail to do it. [Applause].

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORNEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the subject of our expenditures, to which my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] referred a moment ago, for a single purpose, and that is to call attention to the rapidity with which we are enlarging the expenses of Government in every new field that is suggested, and if possible to recall to gentlemen on this side of the House the fact that whatever may be the view of the gentleman from Illinois as to the indifference of the people on the subject of taxation and expenditure, there is a portion of the people of the United States, and a large portion of them, who do not desire to bear unnecessary taxes or to see their hard earnings applied on questionable objects.

In the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, a Congress in which was laid the foundation of whatever measure of success the Democratic party has achieved from that time to this, the appropriations of the public money for scientific surveys were as follows:

West of the hundredth meridian under the War Department: Lieutenant Wheeler, $.0,000; under Professor Hayden, $65,000; under Major Powell, $30,000; in all, $125,000.

At that time I admit there was no surplus in the Treasury.

We appropriate more than $400,000 for the scientific surveys for the present year. The country demanded economy then as I think it does now. While it was easy to be economical at that period it is possible for Congress under the present state of the Treasury to so enlarge the field of expenditures as to render economy in the future practically impossible. And I trust gentlemen who feel an interest in taxation and economy will bear in mind the parties in this country are to test their theories of government and the honesty of their professions with a lavish and corrupting abundance of money in the Treasury. The surplus in the Treasury will test the sincerity of our professions.

I am not complaining of the appropriations for these scientific surveys. Public opinion seems to demand that they shall go on, and there is no doubt that under the direction of Major Powell, a gentleman whose attainments and standing in the world of science is a source of just pride to the whole country, the work is being well performed.

But, sir, the main purpose I have in addressing the House is to call the attention of the House, and especially the gentleman who introduced this proposition [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky], as well as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], who, as I understand, formulated it, as to the effect of the pending measure. The point in the amendment to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Colorado is as follows:

That all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale, as the property of the United States, and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law.

I do not understand clearly the meaning of this language:

And all the lands which may hereafter be designated, etc., are from this time henceforth hereby reserved, etc.

The language here, it will be observed, is "which may hereafter be designated." My friend from Colorado will see at once that this provision does not preserve an acre of this land from entry under the desert-land law or any other land law unless it is intended to vacate entries made before the land is designated. It has only the effect of withdrawing from sale lands that shall have been designated as sites of reservoirs and canals, etc., and lands which will be benefited by virtue of the reservoirs and canals through the system of irrigation proposed after the fact of their being benefited is ascertained. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if that is the purpose of the amendment, that the lands are only set apart or reserved after being "so designated?"

Mr. SYMES. It is not; I will state the effect of the amendment——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will be very brief, as I have but a few moments.

Mr. SYMES. I will not take a moment.

The amendment was drawn as an improvement or modification of the Senate amendment in that particular regard. There was considerable debate in the Senate as to whether this amendment would, in præsenti, or from this time forth, reserve the lands where reservoir sites should be located under this provision; and Senator REAGAN and others offered amendments for that purpose.

After they had fixed the amendment up in the Senate and it had come to the House I scrutinized it very carefully, in connection with other gentlemen, and have drawn the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky for the particular purpose of reserving from this time forth the lands which should be selected as the sites of the reservoirs——

Mr. HOLMAN. And that is intended to be the effect of this language:

> And all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals, etc., are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale, etc.

Does the gentleman mean that after the passage of the act these lands shall be reserved from sale; that is, all lands which shall be ultimately designated as necessary for the canals, reservoirs, and ditches, shall not be subject to entry?

Mr. WEAVER. It was to except just such lands from entry and sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then it is intended to have a retroactive effect; its operation being to take from persons who may have entered lands which shall be found embraced in such sites, or benefited by irrigation during the interim and while this survey is being made, the lands on which they may have entered?

Mr. SYMES. If the gentleman will permit me I will state in brief that there was some objection to the amendment I drew in the first instance, reserving all lands which might become susceptible of irrigation by means of the reservoirs. That language may be modified by the Senate conferees, and after consultation I am satisfied that it can be made acceptable to them.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would like to ask this question: Does the gentleman intend hereby that all lands hereafter, at any time hereafter, that may be found necessary for the sites of the reservoirs, canals, or ditches, or that may be made valuable by irrigation through such sources, shall be reserved from entry, and that entries made hereafter in the interval shall not be operative?

Mr. SYMES. That is the intention of the amendment and its effects as it now stands. I know that the Senate conferees will agree to the first part of the amendment; that is to say, from now on all lands selected for reservoirs, ditches, or canals shall be absolutely reserved, and that if A, B, or C in the mean time locates upon them that he shall be subject to be dispossessed, if the sites are necessary for such purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed so.

Mr. SYMES. And so far as it relates to reserving all the lands, that of course may be modified.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of this explanation I wish to say only this: That the Committee on the Public Lands have considered the propriety of withdrawing from entry the desert lands, except those entered under the homestead law.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment? I wish to say that I wrote that amendment in order to give the Committee on the Public Lands an opportunity to legislate upon the subject hereafter at the next session of Congress, and I wrote it because they had failed to introduce practical legislation on the subject up to that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was saying that this subject had been before the Committee on the Public Lands, and the question whether or not it would be desirable to suspend all laws authorizing the disposal of the desert lands until further legislation was secured. That legislation can be had at a comparatively early day. I think the present House land bill now before the Senate would accomplish it in a general way, and that a law covering the whole field I think can be carried through Congress during the present term, though possibly not during this session. It is a measure of great importance.

But what is going to be the effect of a permanent withdrawal, not for a year, until legislation can be had upon the subject, or for two years, but for five years, of these lands? It should be remembered that this survey alone is to extend through a period of five years at least at a cost of over $5,000,000; and in view of the uncertainty of the time, it would be very unsafe for gentlemen to assume that the topographical survey of the lands would be accomplished in the five years, as suggested. It may probably occupy much more time than that, during which the entries of lands under the desert-land law and the homestead law would be prohibited absolutely. Now, that brings me to consider this point: are gentlemen aware of the rapidity with which these so-called desert lands are being taken up and improved under the present laws by private enterprise?

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and others who have discussed the subject, assume that here is an enterprise where the individual citizen counts for nothing, that you must depend upon the Federal Government to take the initiative steps, at least to make the surveys. These gentlemen, I take it, will be surprised if they would examine the records of the General Land Office, which shows that since the passage of the act of 1877, known as the desert-land laws, entries have been made to the extent of 922,900 acres of land in Colorado, and more than 1,600,000 acres in Wyoming, and more or less in other States and Territories. Since the 3d of March, 1877, there have been entered of lands under the desert-land law alone 5,564,607 acres. I present the following table, prepared at the General Land Office, which shows how much desert land has been entered under the desert-land law alone in each State and Territory:

Number and area of original and final desert-land entries from the passage of the act of March 3, 1877, to June 30, 1888, by States and Territories.

States and Territories.	Original desert.		Final desert.
	No.	Acres.	No.	Acres.

California	2,505	922,901.16	283	84,241.36
Dakota	35	20,021.00	1	300.00
Idaho	1,659	458,386.24	353	88,871.00
Montana	2,469	876,029.74	760	224,782.63
Nevada	566	162,012.37	106	26,740.25
New Mexico	893	246,555.02	76	19,099.20
Oregon	481	139,071.09	126	39,802.33
Utah	2,565	513,319.06	475	80,915.91

Total	16,821	5,564,607.01	3,391	1,030,928.13

Now, gentlemen must not assume that. Under laws which have been in operation for eleven years, and which up to this time have not been satisfactory, 5,564,607 acres have been patented, for the entries in many cases are not yet matured. But see, gentlemen, how rapidly during the period of five years or more, while your surveys are in progress, private enterprise would enter that field, open up these lands and cultivate them, as shown by the table I have presented. Gentlemen are aware of another fact. Congress declared forfeited in the Forty-eighth Congress the grant of land to the Texas Pacific Railroad; and yet there are bills being pressed upon our Committee of Public Lands for refunding to a large body of settlers on the alternate sections of that land $1.25 an acre, for they paid $2.50 an acre for it. According to my judgment (and I have passed over the ground) almost the entire grant to the Texas Pacific would be designated as desert lands. Yet portions of these desert lands have been entered at $2.50 an acre, and are still being entered upon at that price.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Is not that confined to portions of the country where there are small streams from which irrigation can be obtained?

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to know of the gentleman from Indiana what information his committee has on one point that I have not heard discussed here in reference to the location of the reservoirs on these desert lands. The main question is as to the reservation to the Government and to the people of the great water supply in the cañons, in the streams, and all the sources of water for irrigation. I think that is more important than the land itself, because that will determine whether or not it ought to be reserved from entry and sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. I agree with my friend upon that. The bill which passed this House long ago and which is in the Senate contemplates reaching that object. My friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] offered an amendment, and I hope that that amendment will ultimately be modified and adopted, so as to extend its operations more completely to the desert lands; yet there are two exceedingly important provisions in that which would render monopoly of the water courses absolutely impossible.

Mr. BLAND. That simply relates to the quicksand streams in that country.

Mr. HOLMAN. It applies to all.

Mr. BLAND. That water that trickles along down the mountain sides, the little cañons, the rains and water from the snows on these mountains, and that all ought to be reserved.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa and the two provisions in the land bill which passed the House seek to accomplish the object desired by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

I wish to add that there is nothing so indefinite as the term "desert lands." There are vast regions of country, as gentlemen are aware, in the eastern part of Colorado and the western portions of Kansas and Nebraska which twenty-five years ago would have passed under the designation of this bill as desert lands that are now covered with prosperous farms—not limited areas, but wide, extended districts of country. But the atmospheric changes which have occurred in those regions by opening up the prairies by cultivation will not take place, I admit, in the vast region of country lying farther to the west.

The question I wish to present is, are you prepared on such slight investigation as we have had, such hasty inquiry and such partial knowledge of the facts, to stop the private enterprise which in a comparatively short period of time has already entered over 5,000,000 acres of this so-called "desert land" and is transforming them into prosperous homes? Will you on such slight data suspend private enterprise in that vast region? Will you take from your people the works they are doing so well and place it under the paternal care of the Federal Government?

While the Government by the expenditure of millions is adopting some general system of irrigation, private enterprise would open up as prosperous homes and cultivated fields millions and millions of acres of these so-called desert lands; past experience demonstrates the truth of this.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. By the homesteader?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, by the homesteader. The bill which has passed the House opens up the desert lands to homestead entry, and thousands of homes now exist on lands embraced in the definition of "desert lands."

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time had I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had to 1 o'clock and 13 minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] to give me further time.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield to the gentleman further time.

Mr. WEAVER (to Mr. HOLMAN). Do you think there is any prospect of the Senate passing the bill the House passed?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill, I feel sure, will pass during the present Congress, but I do not say it will pass during this session. And it will accomplish a great deal that is sought to be accomplished by this measure. It will prevent the monopoly of your water courses; it will prevent the monopoly of your coal fields; it will prevent the monopoly of your public lands.

But, Mr. Speaker, in the very short time that is left me I ask this House to pause in legislating upon this subject until they have facts before them upon which they can safely act. I sympathize fully with the object of this measure. There never has been any measure proposed promising to increase the number of homes for our people that has not had my heartfelt and earnest sympathy. But I want to know a good many things before I vote for this proposition. With the facts fully before Congress I shall hope to see proper legislation having in view the reclamation of such desert land as private enterprise can not reach. In doing so, however, I shall take into account the extent to which private enterprise may be able and willing to open up that country without Government aid.

Whatever private enterprise can accomplish is far better than that which results from Government action, if for no other reason, because it secures the final benefits to the persons who are really entitled to them. Before I vote for this or any similar measure I want to know how we are to provide that the benefits which shall flow from it and the increased wealth which it will ultimately create shall result in securing for the great mass of the people an additional territory upon which they can secure homes, instead of enlarging the fortunes of a few men at the expense of the whole people.

I have never known an artificial system devised and fostered by Government that did not ultimately result to the advantage of the few instead of to the benefit of the many. Your grand expanse of prosperous homes is the outgrowth of simply just and equal laws. I want to know how this measure will affect the enormous land grants that have been made to railroad corporations. This is one of your grand schemes for enlarging by artificial methods the public wealth, and it has blighted vast regions of your country with the curse of land monopoly. I want to know what its ultimate effect will be upon the vast grants which you have given to the Southern Pacific Railroad corporation, whose road traverses one of the largest "desert" fields in the country. I want to know to what extent it will increase the wealth of the few men to whom you have given millions of acres of land, large districts of which are so-called desert land, and which are still held by the Atlantic and Pacific Railway corporation. I want to see what will be the effect of this measure on the empire of public land which you granted to the Northern Pacific and which the Senate up to this time refuses to restore to the public domain. I want to see how far it will benefit and enlarge the wealth of that other great beneficiary of this Government, the Union Pacific system of corporations, to which you made such liberal grants of the public domain, and Government bonds, which have resulted in piling up wealth in the coffers of a few men to an extent and by a policy hitherto unknown in the history of governments. I want to see what will be the effect of this measure in enlarging the wealth of all these great corporations at the expense of the people before I enter upon it. I want Congress to understand more fully than now how far private enterprise has grappled and can grapple with this problem of desert lands. I wish to see, sir, how far these lands when reclaimed can be secured for homes for our people.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the aspects of the question which I hope this House will consider before entering upon any definite system of legislation upon this subject.

I expect, with the approval of your Committee on Public Lands, to ask the House, on the day after to-morrow, to consider a bill to suspend the desert-land law for the time-being, and to suspend all your land laws except the homestead law and the mineral land law, at least until the pending land bill shall be finally acted on. With that measure the law we can safely postpone this measure until full information is obtained.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have only a few minutes left, and I want to make one additional remark. I very cordially indorse the views so glowingly and eloquently expressed upon this floor yesterday by the gentlemen representing the Territories of Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and Montana [Mr. TOOLE]. I have watched the growth and development of our great Territories from year to year for many years past, and nothing in that development has gratified me more than the steady growth in the intelligence, capacity, and high character of the gentlemen who have successively represented these great Territories Congress after Congress upon this floor. [Applause.]

I sympathize with the views which were expressed here yesterday by the representatives of the Territories. I was delighted with the enthusiam and confidence in which those gentlemen spoke of their respective Territories. What I said upon the subject of homes on a former occasion, and to which my friend from Montana referred, was said in the same spirit in which I have submitted these few remarks this morning. What I fear is that this measure, this artificial plan of Federal legislation for the enlargement of the public wealth, will result, not in enlarging the number of freeholds and homes for the benefit of the great mass of the people, but in increasing the wealth and estates of the few.

In view of our past history I distrust this kind of legislation. I hope that we shall not take any positive action upon this subject until we can see more clearly the practical results that will follow. My friend [Mr. SMITH, of Arizona] dwelt eloquently upon the subject of homes for the people, and while he was speaking so eloquently of homes I could not but recall in memory from the long ago the language of a poet who wrote in a different clime, but whose ideal realm could only be realized in this blessed country of ours.

This land of cheerful and prosperous homes could only fill the ideal of the poet. The poet said:

There is a land, of every land the pride,
Beloved by Heaven o'er all the world beside;
Where brighter suns dispense serener light,
And milder moons emparadise the night;
A land of beauty, virtue, valor, truth,
Time-tutor'd age, and love-exalted youth;
The wandering mariner, whose eye explores
The wealthiest isles, the most enchanting shores,
Views not a realm so bountiful and fair,
Nor breathes the spirit of a purer air;
For in this land of Heaven's peculiar grace,
The heritage of nature's noblest race,
There is a spot of earth supremely blest,
A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rest,
Here woman reigns; the mother, daughter, wife,
Strews with fresh flowers the narrow way of life;
In the clear heaven of her delightful eye,
An angel-guard of loves and graces lie;
Around her knees domestic duties meet,
And fireside pleasures gambol at her feet.
"Where shall that land, that spot of earth be found?"
Art thou a man?—a patriot? look around;
O, thou shalt find, howe'er thy footsteps roam,
That land thy country, and that spot thy home!

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen must pardon me for recalling this scrap of a grand poem, for I think it is my first offense. From the beginning of my career in this House I have taken a lively interest in the subject of dedicating forever the public domain, that source of all the wealth and greatness of the nation, for homes for our people. I believed in the beginning, as I still believe, that the distribution of that vast body of wealth among our people in the form of independent freeholds was the only measure that would guaranty to the people of the United States the permanence of their free institutions.

My mind has been directed to that subject more than any other; my whole heart has been in it; and I assure the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] that no words shall ever fall from my lips the purpose of which is not to enlarge to the greatest degree possible by the employment of the public resources the number of the independent and prosperous homes of the people of the United States. These homes are the bulwark of our free institutions, while land monopoly is their deadliest enemy.

Mr. SYMES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very highly the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], for I know that he has been sincerely and energetically working for a number of years in the direction indicated. And I can say without ostentation that I have for the past ten years, in season and out of season, been doing what I could in my humble way to attract the attention of the American people to the importance of this question of homes for the people. But, sir, we know it is true that at this time the speculator is acquiring large areas of our public demain. Just at this juncture in the history of the country it has become apparent to that class of men that the great area, 1,000,000 square miles, of what is now known as our arid desert land will soon have to be occupied as homes by our people—must be covered with an industrial population, and that irrigation must be relied upon to make it fruitful and inhabitable.

Knowing this, the speculators are to-day investing in that portion of the public domain in the arid region which must be used hereafter as sites for reservoirs upon which to store the surplus water which falls upon that country in certain seasons of the year. It was my understanding that the amendment now pending was directed to the preservation of that portion of the public domain, not to the withdrawal of all the desert land from entry hereafter. I think that if the amendment is as comprehensive as is indicated by the gentleman from Colorado, it should be modified so as to reserve simply that portion of the desert land which must be occupied or devoted hereafter to the storage of water for purposes of irrigation. I am not clear that we ought to go further than that.

Mr. SYMES. That is as far as the amendment will go with the amendment which I propose to offer.

Mr. WEAVER. But, sir, the necessity is very urgent that we should reserve at this time that portion of those lands which I have indicated. If this Congress should fail to act, the speculators of the country who are now awake to the necessities of the future will certainly before the assembling of another Congress gather up millions of acres, including nearly all the sites for reservoirs. Let the present amendment reserve that and reserve also the right of way for such ditches as it may be necessary to construct hereafter. Then let the appropriation be very moderate at present, for the purpose of obtaining the information necessary to a proper understanding of this great project, and I shall feel that a great public good has been accomplished.

Let me say one word further, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN], who seems to think that no man can tell what effect this system is likely to have upon the flow of water in the Mississippi River and its wonderful western tributaries. The fact that Major Powell said he could not say what would be the effect is evidence of the conservative character of his mind. It is impossible to make even an approximate statement of that kind. But, sir, I have lived long enough in the West to know one thing—that an uncultivated prairie is a watershed. The surplus water which falls upon it is precipitated into the streams in torrents, creating tremendous floods, while a cultivated prairie is a sponge, absorbing the water that falls upon it, and then it trickles into the adjacent streams by slow degrees and breaks forth in beautiful springs to refresh the country; and thus the floods are stayed. Sir, this is a great and good undertaking. A blessing is promised to him who gives even a cup of water to a thirsty soul. This seeks to give fountains and springs and lakes and fruitfulness to millions of people. The Good Book tells us that the Great Law Giver will "cause the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder he restraineth." We want to cause the floods to serve the people, and to restrain the remainder. I am for the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado ought certainly to be adopted, if any appropriation at all is to be made for this purpose. I do not think, however, that $250,000 ought to be appropriated; $50,000 would be sufficient. But whatever appropriation may be made should be accompanied with that amendment. Any one who has lived any length of time in those mountain ranges is aware of the importance of water as well as timber. In the mining regions of California great water privileges went into the hands of monopolies; and that is what is taking place in those mountain ranges to-day. All that I think Congress ought to do in this regard is to reserve from public sale those mountains themselves, with the springs and little brooks trickling from them, so that the people of this country through the Government may have control of the great water supply, and that it shall not be permitted to go into the hands of individuals or private corporations for speculation.

That far we ought to go; and that far I am willing to go. That does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that we commit this Government to a grand scheme of opening up that country by appropriations of money, but it does mean that we reserve to the Government the power of opening up the water and the timber of that country to those who may enter upon those lands and desire the use of the water and the timber under such regulations as the Government may prescribe. We do this with regard to timber now; why not with regard to water? If a corporation desires to go upon any of the watersheds in those mountains to locate a cañon down which is trickling a little stream all the year round, or a spring that may be worth in the future millions of dollars, let the location be made under certain conditions prescribed by Congress, so that the people who may hereafter settle that country shall be entitled to the use of such water supplies and at a figure which will make it possible for them to enjoy that use. Unless this be done, the same thing will happen in regard to those agricultural lands which occurred in California in the early days with regard to mineral lands when all the water privileges were located and held by private corporations as monopolies, so that the miner had sometimes to pay all that his mine was worth for the privilege of obtaining water with which to work it. This amendment, contemplating, as I believe it does, the reservation of those mountains and the mountain streams, springs, or other supplies of water, ought to accompany this appropriation if it is made at all. I approve of the object, and think this a great, patriotic, and statesmanlike step to be taken.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYMES. The other side have more time remaining than we have, and we should like to hear from them.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not think there is any opposition.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FORNEY. We are ready to vote. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no gentleman desires to discuss this proposition further, the Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. SYMES. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER].

Mr. VANDEVER. Mr. Speaker, the few words I desire to say are upon one point, in reference to conducting waters from the mountains to the thirsty plains below, which has not yet been referred to. We people who live over in that country where these thirsty plains abound have much keener appreciation of the question involved in this proposition than those do who live in a country where there is an abundant rainfall and where the great question of irrigation is but little considered.

I say in this connection, the water brought to the plains directly from the mountains possesses far greater fertilizing properties than rain from the clouds. Water brought from the mountains and distributed upon these plains produces a good deal the same effect that waters of the Nile do upon that great and prolific valley. The water carries in solution from its mountain sources mineral properties which when spread over the land enrich it and add to its productiveness. We have an illustration of this in our own country. Go to-day into the valley of the Rio Grande; you find there parcels of land about Albuquerque or Mesilla which have actually been in cultivation year after year without interruption for the last five hundred years, and not the slightest diminution in their fertility. It arises from the fact it is vitalized by the water coming from the mountains bearing minerals in solution, which, spreading over the fields, replenish as well as irrigate them.

It is one important property of mountain water brought down upon the desert plains of California, Colorado, or any other portion of the country and distributed; it stimulates and enhances the fertility of the soil and increases its productiveness to an astonishing degree. It is one of the marvels of irrigation. There is no land reclaimed that is equal in productive qualities to that land which is fertilized by the overflow of mountain streams.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] has seen fit to quote from the good book, and I wish to call his attention to that psssage where it speaks of "the rain that cometh down and the snow from heaven." It is the snow which comes down from the summit of these mountains by a wise order of Providence, which seems designed to be held as a supply for a time of drought; and then as it melts under the sun and descends into the valleys below as it has been doing in the past history of this and every country, the mountains have stored the water, to be utilized by the energy of man for the irrigation of deserts and to make them fruitful as the valleys of the Euphrates, the Jordan, and the Nile.

In the early history of mankind, some people suppose the human race to have been in a condition of savagery, but tradition and history do not so inform us; the evidence goes to prove the condition of primitive man to have been one of the highest civilization, and the great enterprises of the earliest civilizations of which we have any knowledge were to provide methods for irrigating waste and desert land. The system is about the same to-day that it was four or five thousand years ago.

It is this kind of enterprise that makes California fruitful. It is this that will reclaim all the desert lying west of the hundredth meridian and convert it into happy homes for the millions, which will bring into requisition land for the landless and homes for the homeless for generations to come, if we now reserve it from the greed of land grabbers and speculators.

Mr. Speaker, I say again in conclusion as I said yesterday, that no more beneficent measure has been submitted to the attention of the House during this session than that contained in the Senate amendment to the sundry civil bill now pending, and I trust it may be adopted.

Mr. SYMES. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to close the debate now, allowing the gentleman from Kentucky and myself to make a few remarks on this side after he concludes?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not think both gentlemen should have the right to speak after me.

Mr. SYMES. I only desired that there should be some understanding.

Mr. HERBERT. I will follow you.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that up to this time ninety-two minutes of the one hundred and twenty have been consumed by the gentleman from Alabama, and seventy-six by the gentleman from Colorado. There yet remains to the gentleman from Colorado forty-four minutes, and twenty-two to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I have but a very few words to add in closing this discussion. I have watched the debate with deep interest, and think I know about what has been said during the course of the debate succeeding the opening of it a week ago on last Saturday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], and myself. I may say, sir, that nothing has been advanced here, not one argument presented, in opposition to the amendment; and, in plain English, I have heard scarcely a word that may be regarded as legitimate criticism upon the propriety of the adoption of the amendment now pending before the House. The only thing that seems to be contended for by our opponents is, that it is assumed to be pledging the Government to an immense scheme of irrigation that will cost many hundreds of millions of dollars. Mr. Speaker, I deny that in toto, and gentlemen who advance that argument have not shown that such is the case.

This amendment simply and only provides an additional appropriation for the Geological Survey, adding to the topographical branch thereof $250,000, and requiring an examination and survey to be made thereby, requiring that this survey shall be extended to the arid regions, and by making the additional surveys and examinations necessary to select the large and numerous natural sites for reservoirs that exist in that country, and then extend the survey to an examination of the natural routes for canals and ditches to and from these reservoirs for the distribution of the water in future when they shall be filled. The amendment also provides for reserving from this time orth all the public domain that shall thus be designated for reservoi rs and canal purposes from occupation or sale.

No gentleman can dispute the statement that I have made as to the exact features of the pending proposition, and I do not believe that any man can question the wisdom of the policy here inaugurated. No gentleman has pretended to say that it is not an entirely proper thing for this House at this time, and in fact that it is not imperative that the Government should do this in order to prevent what I explained would take place over a week ago if it did not, namely, that private surveyors and engineers of private corporations would be found throughout this region selecting some of these best sites for reservoirs on the public domain, and by hook or by crook, under the provision of those pre-emption laws that have resulted in so much land grabbing in the last twenty years, obtain title to them and thereby dictate or acquire power to dictate to those persons, who may in the future under the homestead law take possession of the lands which are susceptible of irrigation, exactly what price they shall pay for the use of their own lands or for the use of the water to make them valuable.

That is simply the substance of this amendment. It is a plain, practical proposition. That is all that the appropriation suggests. But gentlemen say that this is an "entering wedge." An entering wedge for what? They say that while they might not object to the amendment if it went no further than the present, that if the Government should do such a reckless thing as to authorize the Geological Survey to do a little more work by its topographical branch, upon which it has already expended some $5,000,000 in various parts of the country, and require through that topographical branch an examination and selection of the natural reservoirs throughout the arid regions, that it will absolutely and necessarily result in the United States going into the irrigation business at an expenditure of untold millions.

Mr. Speaker, I deny that. There is nothing in the proposed amendment that in any way commits the Government to any irrigation scheme in the way of filling these reservoirs, ditches, or canals, or having their contents distributed over the adjacent land, or allowing the Government through its agents to sell or peddle this water throughout that country. Not one word to authorize it. Mr. Speaker, there would have been just as much sense in gentlemen getting up here and urging as an objection to the establishment of the Geological Survey, that has been established for the benefit of the people of this country, that when it had pursued its work, when it had examined the geological character of the country, when it had issued its charts and maps and reports which were prepared in pursuance of its scientific work for the benefit of the theoretical and practical prospectors and mining superintendents of this country, by which they obtained information and went out into the mining districts, where the reports pointed out that within a certain formation of limestone when it came near the surface prospecting would develop the presence of carbonate deposits, and as a result of that work these deposits have been developed and millions, almost hundreds of millions of mineral wealth been added to the nation; that when it was proposed to do that and the Government authorized the geological surveys, that it committed the Government to the policy of opening the mines, furnishing the mining machinery, sinking the shafts, bringing the ore to the surface, building smelting works, and making bullion of the ore. There is just as much reason in the one suggestion as in the other.

Again, sir, we have been appropriating about $200,000 a year for some years past as a provision to keep up the topographical branch of the Geological Survey. This appropriation has extended over a period of about ten years past. The topographical survey has been extended over different parts of the country, throughout the different States of the Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Lakes. We might as well say that after the topographical survey shall be made, and it was pointed out that there are marvelously rich natural resources in different parts of the country and within different States of the Union, it commits the Government to the scheme of mining and developing the coal mines or any other mineral deposits disclosed by the topographical survey throughout all parts of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is not a fair way of treating this subject. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], the three gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY, Mr. OATES, and Mr. HERBERT] have all pointed out that you will incur terrible dangers if you proceed to allow the Government of the United States to survey its own public domain, and reserve it so that the policy of the Land Department, as now exhibited by the Public Lands Committee in legislation here, can be carried into effect, so that there shall be small holdings for homesteaders and they shall not be subject to the extortion of private corporations owning the reservoirs into which they have turned the water that gives the value to all lands susceptible of irrigation from it. That is all there is of this so-called scheme. But they say——

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. SYMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. I am sure my friend would not intentionally misstate my position.

Mr. SYMES. I do not object to the gentleman correcting me if I have misstated his position.

Mr. OATES. I said I thought it would be prudent and wise to withdraw from sale such districts as are indicated by the survey already made, and which is now going on; but I was opposed to this scheme which attempts improvements of the public domain by the Government. I do not think that is warranted.

Mr. SYMES. It is an impracticable proceeding to withdraw from the market all these arid lands, as was well shown by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] this morning. I have offered a modification of this amendment which is thought by some members of the House would have that result. We can not say about all this arid region, containing a third of this country, shall be reserved, so that no homesteader or pre-emptor or any one shall go there, because after these surveys shall have been made and the lands classified they might be turned out of their homes.

It is necessary to go and make these surveys in addition to the topographical surveys already made, and locate the sites.

Mr. OATES. As the gentleman states, it is impracticable to withdraw all arid lands from settlement; but I understand that the testimony of Major Powell only goes to the extent of claiming that about 28 per cent. of the arid land might be reclaimed for agricultural purposes by the system that he advocates.

Mr. SYMES. And that is too large an estimate.

Mr. OATES. Then, instead of withdrawing all these arid regions, you could withdraw only such portion as might be required for this purpose.

Mr. SYMES. How are these numerous homesteaders and these pre-emptors and their families who are now going out there, and who are settling at a long distance from where some reservoir may be made and where it may be found practicable to furnish water, to be notified on what land they can safely settle upon. It can only be done by surveys. This amendment goes a long ways and it says to every man hereafter locating land, to the pre-emptor or homesteader, "If you now locate on a homestead or pre-emption claim after this amendment is adopted you take the chances hereafter of having a canal run through your farm or a ditch, or of a part of it being taken by a reservoir, and you will have no claim for damages."

That is going far enough. The other amendment makes a general reservation, and the operation would be to stop the emigration to the West, to stop settlement, stop progress, stop the settling up of the country; and you can not do that. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the House understands pretty well by this time what the amendment really is. I will say to those gentlemen who oppose this amendment because they think it commits the Government to going into the irrigation business, that it does not do so. When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] estimated the cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $960,000,000—I suppose when he made that estimate he proposed to rival the statement in Mark Twain, which was quoted by the other gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], referring to the time when the Mississippi River extended like a fishing-rod into the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those gentlemen who think that future Congresses can not be trusted to deal with the practical question when they meet it face to face. I am not one of those who think that because this Congress may pass a law for the survey and reservation of these reservoir and canal sites, therefore we can not trust future Congresses to dispose wisely of the lands that shall be made susceptible of irrigation by these reservoirs, and sell them perhaps at $5 an acre, as is provided in a bill which I introduced at this session, and which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Sir, there will be some good statesmen in the next Congress, and in the next Congress after that, and in the next, and I believe that my distinguished friends who think we are in danger of creating another national debt if we make a small appropriation of this kind will find, or if they do not their children will find, that wise statesmen will continue to grow up in this country. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in the sentiment expressed by Abraham Lincoln: I have great confidence in the ultimate good sense of the American people; and I believe this legislative body can be trusted to do what is proper at this time, as I believe that future Congresses can be trusted to take care of this great question when they are confronted with it. It is a great question, Mr. Speaker. As I said the other day, it has been the habit of gentlemen to rise here and find fault with what has been done before; is has been their habit to say that this country has been half ruined by grants of public land that have been heretofore made to corporations. It has been their custom to say that if it had not been for those grants we would now have abundant homes left for future millions.

Now, I say to those gentlemen that this amendment which we are insisting upon is immediately and imperatively necessary in order that these reservoir sites may be reserved for the benefit of the people, in order that vested rights shall not grow up and stand in the way of future legislation when Congress shall be called to deal further with this question as time shall show the necessity for it. Mr. Speaker, how long have I spoken?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has spoken eighteen minutes.

Mr. SYMES. I desire to read an extract in relation to the Geological Survey from Secretary Lamar's annual report, because several gentlemen have intimated here that the object of those in charge of that survey seemed to be to secure all the appropriations they could, and to make no great practical use of them. Mr. Secretary Lamar in his last annual report said:

> I ask special attention to the report of the Director of the Geological Survey. Apart from the achievements of this bureau as one of the great instrumentalities for the advancement of scientific research, I desire to express my admiration of its organized system for the transaction of business. In order to determine whether it was consistent with my duty to sanction the estimates for this bureau, it became necessary for me to look into the details of its practical operation. While undertaking to perform this duty I was struck with the perfect adaptation of the system to the securing of efficient work and rigid economy, as well as to fixing by documentary evidence the responsibility for the business transacted, and of making the documentary and the actual responsibility coincident. The Director reports that satisfactory progress has been made in the topographic work of the year. An aggregate of 55,683 square miles have been surveyed."

And so on.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I appeal to this House, delay not the adoption of this Senate amendment. Delay it not until you find that vested rights are in the way of reserving what is so necessary for the future homesteader and the small farmer throughout that arid region, namely, the command of water. That is the principal object in that country. Land is the incident and water the paramount object in an irrigating country. I wish this House and the people of the whole country to profit by our experience in Colorado, where an alien corporation constructed a ditch which it was supposed would add to the value of the lands of the homesteaders and the pre-emptioners down on the plains below. When the water reached those lands the company asked $50 an acre "royalty;" that is, it required the people to pay $50 an acre for the privilege of being permitted to buy water thereafter at such annual rates per acre as should be fixed by the board of directors of the corporation.

But, sir, thanks to the wisdom of the makers of the organic law of Colorado, who incorporated into the constitution a provision that the waters of the State should remain public property for public use, it was decided by the courts that no corporation, and no individual, under a right of prior appropriation could acquire anything more than the right to take the water, and convey it and sell it and distribute it under rules and regulations to be made in pursuance of acts of the Legislature. The company opposed the regulation of charges for conveying the waters, and said that the law which undertook to dictate to them the price at which they should sell water was unconstitutional. The question went into the courts and it was decided in favor of the State statute.

I think it probable, sir, that the time will come when these reservoirs will be turned over to the States and when each State will have an irrigation bureau. I have not advocated, and until there is a great change in the practical aspect of this question I would not vote for, the creation of an irrigation bureau under the Federal Government to distribute water and peddle it out by Government agents. I appeal to the House at this time: keep this matter within your own control, so that, in pursuance of your public land policy, you may hereafter retain these sites for reservoirs and ditches and canals upon the public domain, to do with them as may seem best for the interests of the people.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, to sum up the situation as briefly as possible, it seems to me to be this: Topographical surveys have been going on in the arid region among the mountains for about fifteen years. Prior to 1879 there were four of these surveys. In 1879 they were all consolidated, and since that time the Geological Survey has been conducting the work by itself. The survey is topographical and geological. The only original authority for making the survey at all was contained in a clause of an appropriation bill in these words: "To continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States." Under these few words this great bureau has been built up. In the first fiscal year after its organization, ending June 30, 1880, its expenditures were $106,000; in 1881, they were $156,000. I have not the figures for 1882, but the expenditure was about $200,000; in 1883, it was $258,000; in 1884, $341,000; in 1885, $504,000, and in 1886 it was $526,000. I have not the amount for 1887, but for the last fiscal year the appropriation amounted to $675,000. The bill we are considering contains an appropriation of $677,000 for this work, and the Senate has put on an amendment adding $250,000 more. What for? Ever since the survey was organized, as the Director testifies, he has been investigating the condition under which these arid regions could be irrigated and the floods of the Mississippi and other streams controlled.

Keeping this purpose always in view he has done this topographic work so that one may mark out on the map each one of those catchment basins as he calls them; and you may say without going on the ground at all: "Here in this region is a catchment basin." The purpose of this additional appropriation of $250,000 is to have done still more topographical work of this same character, and in addition thereto to have marked out on the ground itself—not only on the map, but on the ground by stakes or other monuments—the particular sites for reservoirs, hereafter to be built by somebody. Now, the question is, by whom? At present all the land easily and cheaply irrigated is found to have been taken up. That whole country, according to the figures given to us this morning by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is being very rapidly settled; and we are coming to the point, if we have not already reached it, at which any further irrigation must be done upon a large scale; these reservoirs must be located, and canals, as the Director of the Geological Survey says, must be surveyed and eventually built, conveying that water 20, 30, 40, and 50 miles away.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. In India they convey the water nearly 3,000 miles.

Mr. HERBERT. As the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] interrupts me to say, water is conveyed in this way in India 3,000 miles; and I have no doubt in the world that if there be water enough, the canals contemplated in this scheme will, many of them, be, if not 3,000 miles, at least several hundred miles long.

This is a great, a stupendous work; and just at this point Congress is asked to adopt an amendment not only appropriating more money for the topographic work already being done, but providing also that some of it shall be used in the location of these reservoirs. And that is not all; the amendment provides for the withdrawal of these lands from market.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] indicates that he intends in some manner to modify this amendment. But however it may be modified, I suppose it will substantially provide that no more homesteads are to be allowed upon this land. You propose to say by law, "No more homesteads shall be allowed; private enterprise shall no longer enter upon these lands." It must wait. How long? Neither the gentleman from Colorado nor anybody else has told us. And for what? The gentleman from Colorado has especially, and with great detail, refused to tell us. But the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has done so, so has the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE], so has the gentleman from California [Mr. VANDEVER], so has the gentleman from Nebraska. These gentlemen come out openly and say that the Government must do this work, must undertake this great scheme. Sir, it must come to that.

If the Government now says, "We withdraw this land; we allow hereafter no settlements upon it under the desert-land act or the homestead act; this land is reserved for reservoirs," what follows? Why, sir, that the Government which refuses to allow private individuals to do this work must itself undertake it. If we adopt this provision, if we refuse to allow private enterprise to go on these lands, I ask gentlemen to imagine the clamor which will come up here from those interested in the settlement of that all arid region, demanding that the Government shall do what it has forbidden others to do, and how can we refuse? So far as I am aware, no gentleman has told us—the gentleman from Colorado has not dared to say—what sort of legislation is to follow this. He says, "Oh, no; nothing is contemplated except a withdrawal of the lands from market until this survey shall be made and these reservoirs located." I have asked the question, "What then?" and he has not answered. This debate has now run for days and nobody can answer that question, unless he comes squarely up, as these gentlemen I have named have done, and says, "Of course the Government must do this work."

I can not see that anything else is to follow. There is nobody who can give a reason why the lands should be withdrawn, why private individuals should not be allowed to do this work, unless the Government intends to undertake it.

Now, a word upon the question of cost. I want to repeat briefly what I said the other day, that the cost of this work must be immense. Work done by the Government always costs a great deal more than when done by private enterprise. It is not necessary to argue that proposition. Take as a sample of how Government money goes the expenditures of this Geological Survey. They have run up and up from $150,000 a year until they have now reached, outside of this proposed expenditure of $250,000, $657,000 a year. More than $4,000,000 have already been expended. Four years ago, when investigating this survey, I calculated that, according to the figures then given by Major Powell, the geological map of the United States, when finished, would cost $17,000,000. Now, I must revise my estimate, as he has revised his. The calculation is a simple one. If it is to take thirty years from this time—and that is what he now says—four years ago he said twenty-four from that date, now it is thirty years from this time he says it will take at the rate he is going on—the geological map of the United States will cost $20,000,000 in addition to the $4,200,000 heretofore spent. But, sir, I want to say for Major Powell that the Geological Survey is not the only expensive nor is it the most expensive bureau in this Government. Take the Coast Survey. That was started in 1807; from time to time between 1807 and 1843 it was shifted to and fro between the Navy Department and the Treasury Department. From 1843 down to the present time it has continued under the same organization; and the expenses of that bureau up to 1886, including the hydrographic work in connection with it by the Navy Department, amounted to over $24,000,000. We curtailed it some after this Administration came in, but it is still spending a great deal of money.

And, sir, although that $24,000,000 had been spent up to 1886, yet not then, nor even now, has that Coast Survey gotten through with its topography of the coast. That bureau, like every other bureau which once gets started, has determined to perpetuate itself. Just as this Geological Survey is now endeavoring to extend its operations, so has the Coast Survey gone into geodesy and magnetism, and for years has been making every effort to get into the whole broad field of electricity. It is magnifying itself in every possible direction. After these bureaus are once started they grow year by year. The Coast Survey has now an annual appropriation of $483,000, somewhat less just now than years ago, but the National Museum has $186,000, and for ethnology $40,000.

Mr. WEAVER. When you have done so much for the water, now let us do something for the land.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Iowa interrupts me by saying we have done so much for water, let us now do something for the land. Yes, that seems to be the argument—one extravagance is an excuse for another; that is the logic of the situation.

The Senate has sent us not only this but another scheme of similar character. Following after this is another amendment to this bill for a great zoological park in Washington. That is to be established, too, regardless of expense. The elephant and a kangaroo and all known animals are to be collected here in one great park.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And the gyascutis. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. For the delectation of the people who come from all parts of the country to visit the capital. But what of the tax-payer of the country who is not able to visit the capital, what share has he in that, what share has he in such great schemes as this? In a word, this seems to be the policy: Let the lion roar at the national capital, let the American eagle scream, and let the tax-payer foot the bill in the sweat of his face. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks made this morning on this question, and with all the more attention because the gentlemen with whom I heretofore have generally and cordially concurred are opposed to the amendment. I think, with all respect to them, it is because we look at this question from entirely different standpoints; they from a highly imaginative view, and I from a consideration of the plain, practical legislation which they have heretofore adopted. My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], my friends from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY and Mr. HERBERT], my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have heretofore, with the other members of the House, adopted the scheme which they now denounce as chimerical, improper, and extravagant.

Let us get exactly our attitude. On the 12th day of March the Committee on the Public Lands offered as a matter of privilege a unanimous report, recommending the passage of the resolution which I hold in my hand. That resolution says:

That the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Director of the Geological Survey, be, and he is hereby, directed to make an examination of that portion of the arid region of the United States where agriculture is carried on by means of irrigation, as to the natural advantages for the storage of water for irrigating purposes, with the practicability of constructing reservoirs, together with the capacity of the streams and the cost of construction and capacity of reservoirs, and such other facts as bear on the question of storage of water for irrigating purposes; and that he be further directed to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation.

My distinguished friend [Mr. COX], who made the other day the speech on this question which really closed the argument, and was as conclusive as it was eloquent and beautiful, was Speaker pro tempore.

The gentleman from Illinois claimed that the resolution was a matter of privilege. The Speaker pro tempore doubted it, so the attention of the House was called to the matter. Mr. PAYSON said:

This resolution is reported back under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt whether this is a privileged question, and will ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. PAYSON. It is clearly privileged under the rule.

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. PAYSON. I move that the joint resolution be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

So that the attention of the House was specially called to this resolution; and these gentlemen who for the last two or three days have been declaiming with such force and eloquence against this bureau and the various bureaus of the Government—my friend from Tennessee, who does not believe in any science except that science which inures to the strictest economy, my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who prepared and submitted a large and valuable report about this very bureau some years ago—were all silent while this terrible scheme which now affrights them as they look into the dim future was unanimously and deliberately adopted by the House.

When the Committee on Appropriations, therefore, came to the appropriation of the money for this bureau the Congress had ordered that bureau already to make the survey. It was said by one of the gentlemen, and no doubt correctly, that under the law perhaps the bureau had the power already to do it. But this is a special resolution ordering this special work, and I presume the Secretary of the Interior would feel obliged to use such other sums given in this very appropriation bill to which these gentlemen make no objection, the $199,000 for the topographical survey and $100,000 for geographical surveys, or so much of the $199,000 as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out this order, which has not been repealed, and which these gentlemen have not made any effort to repeal, in preference to the other work to which these sums are and ought to be devoted, for it is his duty to execute the order of Congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, when we come to vote on this question to-day let us understand that the law is already in existence ordering the work to be done, and an amount of money is given to this bureau; so that the simple question presented is whether the amount shall be larger or smaller, and whether we shall reserve from sale or occupation the lands in question.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman think that we are coerced in any manner to vote money for this purpose because we passed that resolution?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Undoubtedly not; and the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, have the indubitable right to be in a condition occupied by a gentleman who was somewhat notorious in Kentucky, and who while running for office was asked the question "whether he was for the local option law." His answer was "Yes, I am for the law, but agin its enforcement." [Laughter.] They unquestionably have the right if they so choose to pass a law and then refuse to appropriate the amount necessary to enforce it; but I appeal to them and to this House if that is the proper way to legislate about great public matters. Here is a law ordering the work to be done, and now we are gravely refusing to appropriate that amount for this bureau which is required.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to ask if the gentleman does not recollect that Mr. Powell stated that up to this time and before the passage of this resolution more than $4,000,000 had been expended making these topographical surveys?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The amount expended was about a million or a little over a million of dollars, and $4,000,000 is the amount which was expended for the whole of the topographical surveys, but not for this particular section.

Mr. BLOUNT. No; $5,000,000 is the amount estimated for this particular section.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Only a million or less has been expended so far. But that does not change what I desired to say, for the contention that I make is not over the amount to be given to the survey for this purpose. That is not the important matter. My judgment is, I submit to the House, that if we are to carry this out it is better to do it as rapidly as we can; that is, if we want the information we have ordered, the quicker we get the information, the less time occupied in getting it, the better it is for both Congress, the Government, and private enterprise.

In my judgment it is a mistake to scatter the investigation over a long series of years; and that it is cheaper to give to the survey $250,000 or $200,000 for the special purpose this year than to spread it over a series of years, during which things may change, titles to property change, vested rights accrue, and all of these and perhaps other contingencies arise against which no human foresight can guard. That as wise men winding up their business in the business affairs of life, it is better, if the facts are needed, to obtain them as rapidly as possible, so that they may be available for practical good and for such purposes as it may be found useful to apply them to, rather than let the work run through a series of years during which the conditions which now exist will be materially changed. But so far as I am concerned, that was not the most important matter to me.

The House had, with the concurrence of the Senate, under the recommendation of the Committee on the Public Lands, asked for this information, most important information, important as to the arid regions of the country, important as to the expensive problem of the Mississippi River, important in its aspect and bearing upon the great labor questions of the day, important upon the great question of taxation. Congress ordered this information to be obtained; and it seems to me, while that information was being obtained, that the right of the people to the lands which would be benefited by the survey had better be retained by the Government than to be given over to speculators during the period of its obtension.

The real question between the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and myself is here. That information makes that land valuable. I say let us reserve that land from public sale, which is made more valuable by this information. They say that this can probably be carried out by small appropriations, which ultimately will inure for the benefit of private enterprise and those who go there and choose to take up this land. There is the real point of difference between us.

In the name of economy, in the name of the people, they say let this go on and let the land be opened for entry. We say if it goes on let us reserve the land from entry until we see exactly what these facts are. I confess to have listened with some degree of surprise to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who claimed that he represented the homesteaders and wanted free homes to be given to the people, while he was doing all he could to prevent all these lands being kept out of the hands of the speculator; for we can not shut our eyes to the fact that whoever owns the water privileges from which or by means of which the lands of that arid region can be made fertile and arable will own the toll to the land; and he never owns the soil, I care not what be the nature of his title, who does not own the profit from the land, and in that section he who owns the water will control the fruits of the tillage.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask him a question there?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does my friend, apropos to his remarks on that subject, favor the policy of the Government doing this work, and accepting the rent for these lands, or does he expect it ultimately to go into private hands?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I say that, so far as I am concerned, I do not know. And the very thing we want is that the Congress of the United States may have this information and reserve this land, so that the question may be decided in the light of the information we obtain where to have these reservoirs located and what will be their cost and capacity and the amount and value of the land which can be made tillable by irrigation.

Mr. McMILLIN. As my friend does not answer that question, I want to say that the criticism he has made on those who were opposed to the measure is not well founded.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My friend agrees with Rev. Mr. Jasper, that "all science is a lie, and the sun do rise."

Several MEMBERS. "The moon do rise."

Mr. McMILLIN. "Sun do rise!" My friend from Kentucky has got his rising mixed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. One of the curious things is that gentlemen in the name of the people plead for the execution of a law that gives the water privileges of 1,200,000 square miles to speculators who stand ready to take it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I want to know of my friend who is going to prevent the speculators from getting it in any event?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. We are going to prevent it, if gentlemen will vote for the amendment, by taking these lands out of public sale; in the second place, by getting an idea of how these lands lie in the light of practical science, and seeing what they are worth; and in the third place, by giving a fair chance to every citizen of America to have the benefit of these lands after scientific research. [Applause.]

Mr. McMILLIN. It is the plan of doing this that I want to get at.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And the plan is that the Congress of the United States is to adopt the only possible plan, which is to cause this survey to be made and find out what land is there subject to this improvement, and paying out of the Treasury whatever is necessary for a practical and scientific research. That is the whole scheme. If the gentleman asks me what I expect to do when all this information comes in, I can only say that I do not know.

I am against all paternal government. In all my theories I am not only against every form of paternal government but against every form of unnecessary taxation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my friend a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask if under the legislation which is proposed any person locating on this land where this water is has a right to use any more of it than that which he requires for his own purposes?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not profess, sir, to give an opinion on the construction of the complicated system of public laws that we call our land law, much of which has been dictated in the interest of private speculation; but I do mean to say that the very question which my friend has put to me is a question which had better be decided with those lands reserved from sale than with the title of the United States passed by patent to somebody else.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me a suggestion here, I wish to say to him that that question has already been distinctly settled by the action of the Forty-first Congress, which enacted a law providing that "such right shall not exceed the amount of water actually appropriated and necessary for the purposes of irrigation."

Mr. DUNN. That refers to water taken from a river or creek.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is simply the common law. That does not increase or change what I supposed was the right of the owner of lands under the common law. But, Mr. Speaker, I have not time to discuss the legal aspects of the question. I know that a man without a grant of the lands from the Government has no right to that water. What his rights will be if we give him the grant I am not now prepared to say.

To return, then, merely for the purpose of recapitulation, this is not a question whether the Government shall irrigate these arid regions at a cost of one million, or ten millions, or a thousand millions, according to the scheme conjured up by my friend from Alabama. It is not a question of whether it is best for this Government to enter into any project of that kind. Mr. Speaker, may I be excused for an episode just here? Gentlemen have appealed to this side of the House on the ground of economy. I am for economy, sir, but there is political wisdom sometimes in the wise expenditure of money. The Democratic party for twenty years has treated the Territories of the United States meaner than the meanest step-mother ever treated step-children, and it is no want of political wisdom if, within the limits of prudent expenditure, we now show them, as the olden Democratic party did under the lead of such men as Douglas, that we look upon the Territories as younger sisters soon to come in as full sisters in a joint copartnership of sovereign States. It is not an unwise thing for us, if we can do it, to treat those Territories with greater justice and generosity than they have met in the past.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question here boiled down is this: We want to pass certain land laws. The Senate stands in our way. We want to reserve certain lands from sale. The Senate stands in our way. Here, now, in this proposition we can put upon this bill, under the rules of the House and the Senate, a provision which will withdraw from sale a large part of these lands and retain public control over them until we can ascertain whether this will be a wise and economical expenditure of money, leaving to the future all other questions.

If a Presidential campaign were not pending, Mr. Speaker, nobody would oppose this proposition. We are going into a Presidential canvass with mutual crimination and recrimination as to extravagance. I will not give to this question a partisan aspect. To me it has a broader view than that. I find on the statute-book this resolution, brought in by the Committee on Public Lands and unanimously adopted. I find in the reports of Mr. Lamar, as Secretary of the Interior, use for the other moneys given to this bureau, the four hundred and odd thousand dollars. I find that an additional sum is necessary for obtaining this information. I believe that the more quickly it is given the better it will be. All that I take any special interest in is that so far as I am concerned I want to reserve the sale of those lands until we obtain this information. If $250,000 is too much, let the conferees when they go into conference agree upon some smaller sum.

The amendment which I have offered, but which was formulated in accordance with my views as well as his own by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] does not go merely to the sum of money to be expended, but to other things more important. If $250,000 is too much, let the amount be made smaller. The principle involved is that the investigation shall be made as rapidly as possible, and that pending the investigation the lands affected by it shall be withdrawn from sale. The object is first to obtain that information so that we may act upon it as soon as possible; and secondly that those who are to get the benefit of the expenditure of the money shall get it with their eyes open. The amendment is so drawn that it is notice to everybody that, if he takes this land, he takes it subject to this burden. What is to be the further effect of the proposition I care not to take time in discussing, after the exceedingly intelligent way in which the question has been presented by my friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in his speech yesterday, and by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] to-day.

I take the liberty of accepting Mr. STONE'S explanation of my amendment:

What does this amendment propose? It proposes to appropriate $250,000 to inaugurate and prosecute extensive surveys in what is known as the arid region of the country, to locate its boundaries accurately, to ascertain where natural reservoirs may be established for the storage of water supplies, to ascertain the extent and location of these desert or arid lands which may be reclaimed or restored to agricultural uses by a system of irrigation, and to suggest the best and most practicable methods of irrigation. It provides also that all lands that may be utilized and made valuable by irrigation shall, after the passage of this bill, be withdrawn from sale or other disposition until such time as Congress shall provide for disposing of them. That is the sum and substance of the amendment. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, and so far as this question is concerned, that is the whole of it. We ought not to say to the people of America—gentlemen whom I am in the habit of following and whom usually I follow so willingly—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]—can not afford to say that we permitted this resolution to be passed pro forma and at the same time say that it committed us to a scheme to spend one thousand millions of dollars. We are bound by our representative character and duty to say that we took this action, under the lead of the Public Lands Committee, intelligently; and having passed the order that this work be done, we give the money by which it shall be paid for, and in the mean time withdraw those lands from public sale. That is the whole question.

I will not follow gentlemen into either attack or defense of this or other bureaus of the Government, nor as to the feasibility of schemes of irrigation nor their possible cost; nor will I add anything to the observations I submitted to the House when this amendment was under discussion some days ago as to the nature of the problems which were connected with this subject and the possible value of the knowledge which might be secured under the resolution adopted by Congress last March. For myself, I close my part in this debate for this session. What shall be done with that magnificent empire which in this debate has been called "the arid regions" is a question which we and our successors can not shirk. Our duty now is as rapidly and as accurately as practicable to put into intelligible form all the knowledge we can gain pertaining to it, and to reserve the lands until that is done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are three minutes remaining.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], I understand, desires to make a statement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I supposed I had the right to close the discussion. At any rate, I presume I shall be allowed a minute to reply to the gentleman from Georgia.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky lays a great deal of stress upon the resolution to which he has referred contemplating topographical surveys for the purpose of investigating the location of catchment basins and reservoirs. I have already said, and it is almost useless to repeat, that under the general law the propriety of such surveys has always been claimed, and a vast sum of money has already been expended in that way. In this view, therefore, the resolution was merely surplusage; it has no force so far as this amendment goes. The amendment proposes that a sum of money be added to the amount already expended; that and nothing more.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to inquire whether gentlemen here understand how much is appropriated for topographical surveys in this very bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have only a minute, and can not yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is important the amount should be known; it is $199,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Kentucky in one breath urges the rapid expenditure of money in the direction of this survey; yet in the closing portion of his remarks he declares that he cares nothing for the amount of money, but is concerned only in the principle involved, the reservation of these lands from sale. He says so far as the amount is concerned that may be settled by the conference committee. I wish to say that when the amount is agreed upon between the two Houses, as will be done by the adoption of this amendment, there will be nothing for the conferees to discuss with reference to the amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I did say, and I repeat, that the amount of money to be given for this purpose is very much less important in my view than the reservation of the land. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a comparatively large sum of money in one aspect. It is a very small sum in comparison with giving to private speculation the advantages of the water supply for 1,200,000 square miles of arid lands. There is nothing inconsistent in my proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on this proposition is now exhausted.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Is it in order now to move an amendment striking out "$250,000" and inserting "$50,000?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at this time.

Mr. BLAND. If the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado be adopted, will that carry with it an agreement to the appropriation of $250,000 as contained in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary status of this proposition. There is pending a motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] moves to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, to which amendment the gentlemen from California [Mr. FELTON] offers an amendment. No other amendments are in order at this time.

Mr. BLAND. When these amendments have been voted on, it will be in order to move an amendment cutting down the appropriation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain that amendment in due time.

Mr. SYMES. After the amendment of the gentleman from California has been voted on, it will then be in order for me to offer an amendment striking out certain words from the pending amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be in order, unless the previous question should be demanded and ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is in order, I desire to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can offer a substitute now if he desires.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the provision which I send to the desk as a substitute for the entire proposition, as well for the Senate amendment as the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. WEAVER. That can not be voted on until the other amendments have been voted on?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not. The House has a right to perfect the pending proposition before acting upon the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the substitute be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

That the money appropriated for the topographical surveys for the present fiscal year, or any part thereof, may be employed by the Director of the Geological Survey, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility of establishing reservoirs of water in the arid region of country west of the one hundredth meridian with a view to a system of irrigation in the arid region, and the Director of the Geological Survey is directed to report to Congress at as early a period as is practicable the results of such inquiry and all the information he may possess touching the irrigation of the arid lands: Provided further, That during the pendency of the measures now before Congress affecting the public lands the entry of lands known and designated as "desert lands" shall be suspended, but this provision shall not prevent the entry of such land under the homestead laws except that section 2301 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to such entry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question first in order to be voted on is the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. FELTON. Let the proposition be read.

Mr. FELTON'S amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9, first page, after the word "reservoirs," insert "and for the selection of watersheds that shall be preserved."

In fourth line, page 2, after the word "purposes," insert "and such selected watersheds."

Several members asked for the reading of the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 1, on page 66, strike out the following:

"And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law."

And insert in lieu thereof:

"And the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress, on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation; and all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes, and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON].

Mr. FELTON. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the amendment to the amendment——

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The question recurred on Mr. FELTON'S amendment to the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 54.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SYMES. I desire to offer an amendment on behalf of the friends of the measure which I will send forward and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "purposes" in lines 4 and 5 to and including the word "canals" in the seventh line.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the words which are proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals.

Mr. SYMES. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 47.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend the amendment by fixing the appropriation at $50,000 instead of $250,000.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Make it $100,000.

Mr. SYMES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the amendment is voted down will it not then be in order to offer an amendment fixing the sum at $100,000?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. SYMES. Then I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I demand a division on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 68.

So Mr. BLAND'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. I move to fix the amount at $75,000.

Mr. STONE of Missouri. Make it $100,000.

Mr. BLAND. Very well, I will make it $100,000.

Mr. SYMES. We accept the amendment, and move the previous question on the proposition as modified by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted, and the previous question on the amendment is therefore unnecessary.

Mr. SYMES. I understand it is unnecessary, and will therefore withdraw it.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order, as there is an amendment pending now in the second degree. When that is disposed of another amendment will be in order.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know the use of demanding the previous question when debate has been closed on the pending proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. It may be necessary to cut off further amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending amendment is in the third degree, and no further amendment is in order.

Mr. SYMES. The demand for the previous question has been withdrawn.

The question recurred on Mr. BLAND'S amendment to the amendment to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$100,000;" and it was adopted.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to add, after the word "dollars," the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all right.

Mr. SOWDEN'S amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the question on my substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct; the substitute is first in order, and will be again reported by the Clerk.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RYAN and Mr. HOLMAN both rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the regular order. [Cries of "Vote!" and "Regular order!"]

Mr. RYAN. Not a dollar of this money will be available, but is to be devoted to other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. One hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars will be available.

Mr. PAYSON. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Order must be preserved on the floor. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does this carry an appropriation separate from the Geological Survey?

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask the amendment be read, so that we may understand it. There seems to be a misunderstanding amongst members about it.

Mr. HOLMAN'S substitute was again reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. It allows $199,000. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. RYAN. Not a single dollar will be available. It will be devoted to the work already in progress. [Cries of "Order!" from all parts of the House.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members will please assist the Chair in maintaining order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TAULBEE. In order that we may understand the proposition, I ask that it be again read.

Mr. HOLMAN'S substitute was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. One hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars is available under this proposition. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. RYAN. No, sir. There will not be a dollar available, if this substitute passes, for this work, and the gentleman knows it. It will be devoted to the prosecution of other work now in progress. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All debate is out of order.

Mr. DUNN. Does not this take the place of both the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then we will agree to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute which has just been read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires first to be informed as to the exact nature of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair would ask the gentleman to again state his proposition, as there appears to be some misunderstanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is offered as a substitute for the Senate proposition as amended by the pending amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, if that shall be adopted.

Mr. RYAN. But the vote has not yet been taken upon that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then what the gentleman calls a "substitute" is not now in order. The amendment I have offered is first to be voted on to complete the proposition.

Mr. RYAN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman is correct in that as a parliamentary procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute being in the nature of an amendment must be first submitted.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to submit a further point of order. I doubt whether it is a regular proceeding to offer a substitute for a Senate amendment to a bill. Is it not about all we can do to disagree to it or adopt it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is correct. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to offer his proposition as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Kentucky, as amended by the proposition of the gentleman from Colorado; in other words, to agree to the Senate amendment with the substitute, which would be in the nature of an amendment to it.

Mr. DUNN. That is all we could do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the parliamentary condition is this: The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to add to the Senate provision, and I presume the vote on his provision comes first. In the event of its adoption by the House my proposition is then offered as a substitute; that is to say, that we agree to the Senate proposition as amended by the substitute which I offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House must either agree or disagree to the Senate amendment. An agreement under the rules can be made with an amendment.

Mr. RYAN. The question should first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute is first in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Suppose the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky was not pending at all, of course a substitute for the Senate amendment would be in order.

Mr. DUNN. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to say you accept the Senate amendment with a further amendment.

Now the same result follows supposing the House should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. The substitute would then be in the nature of an amendment of the Senate amendment as amended by the gentleman from Kentucky, and would be in order. It is simply an instruction to the committee; nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me submit this parliamentary inquiry: If the House should agree to what has been designated as a substitute by the gentleman from Indiana, will it not be practically a motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment in the form indicated by the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky being agreed to? Will it not simply be a concurrence in the Senate amendment with an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the understanding of the Chair when the proposition was introduced. But the Chair now understands the gentleman from Indiana to offer this as a substitute for the entire proposition, including the Senate amendment.

Mr. SYMES. That is what he stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair is of the opinion that it is not in order, but is willing to hear testimony upon the point.

Mr. HOLMAN. How else would you get at it? The substance of my motion is to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. That is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I so offer it.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. Is not the only motion in order now a motion to disagree with the Senate amendment or to concur in the amendment with an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the position of the gentleman is substantially correct.

Mr. PETERS. Then I make the point of order that the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana is neither a motion to concur in the Senate amendment nor a motion to concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute is in the nature of an amendment and can only be offered in that view and not as a substitute for the Senate amendment.

Mr. COX. Let me ask whether the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky has been voted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been.

Mr. COX. Is it not, then, first in order to dispose of that?

Mr. RYAN. Undoubtedly you must first get rid of that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute of the gentleman from Indiana is first in order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to inquire (if I caught the motion of my colleague who offered the amendment) if it was not to agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment. Now, my point is this: If the vote is submitted on that question it must be to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TAULBEE. And the only way to reach a vote on the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana would be to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment with an amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the question has not been taken on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling which will be found in the Digest, on page 334.

The report of the committee of conference can not be amended or altered, as that of any other committee may be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sees nothing whatever in the reference germane to the pending question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask unanimous consent to submit this proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my amendment and on all pending amendments.

Mr. RYAN. That is right.

Mr. SYMES. Let us have a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent, to avoid any embarrassment on this question and to accomplish what gentlemen desire on both sides, that a vote be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] whether adopted or not, and that a vote be taken upon the proposition which I have submitted as a substitute; and if it be adopted, it will be adopted as an amendment to the Senate amendment in that form.

Mr. SYMES. I object, because it is not in parliamentary form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move my proposition as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is already pending in that form.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. The gentleman from Colorado offered an amendment to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], which was voted down. Now, I make this inquiry, at the instance of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], whether a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado was rejected is in order at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be in order, but the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. It is a question in which the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has a very great interest, and it is of extreme importance to his constituents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the demand for the previous question by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the effect of this call for the previous question upon the pending amendment? In what order does the Chair hold the amendments are pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which is in the nature of an amendment to the Senate amendment, will be voted on first.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. To that I raise the point of order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest, then, as that brings up the question squarely, that the gentleman from Kentucky permit an amendment to be added to the general proposition striking out the $250,000 provided for in the Senate amendment, and then we get to the question. I believe the Chair has decided correctly.

Mr. TAULBEE. That is, to have a vote on the substitute.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Very well; that is all we want.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It leaves the Senate amendment intact, and the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana simply stands as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky; and the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. RYAN and Mr. TAULBEE addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the statement of the Chair differs somewhat from the statement of the gentleman from Indiana as to this proposition; because I put it directly to him as to whether or not the proposition which the gentleman from Indiana offered was intended as a substitute to the Senate amendment and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, and his statement was that it did. Now, as I understand the statement of the Chair just made, it is to the effect that if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted, it is adopted only in lieu of the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and would leave the Senate amendment intact. That it is a substitute operating as an amendment to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the parliamentary status of the proposition. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RYAN. That is the inquiry I intended to make myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I arise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The parliamentary inquiry is this: I desire to submit a proposition which will keep in the Senate amendment. We propose to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. That is to say, instead of appropriating the $250,000 or $100,000 we propose that of the $199,000 appropriated for the topographical survey so much as the Secretary of the Interior shall designate shall be appropriated to make these examinations. Now, is it proper for me to inquire of the Chair how that can be accomplished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition can be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have known that question raised, and I have never seen the question presented as it is now but that the ruling has been uniform that a proposition to add to a Senate amendment was in order. And I desire to submit a proposition covering both; that is, we cover a Senate amendment on the one side and an amendment of the House on the other, if adopted. The first proposition is to add to the Senate amendment; if adopted, or not adopted, either, then the question recurs on the proposition contained in the Senate amendment. I therefore insist that there is no embarrassment here whatever, and that the question still operates on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. We are both hoping to concur in the Senate amendment. My proposition is just as much before the House as the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. No question of order was made on either of them when first submitted. I submit, the vote is to be taken on his amendment first, and if adopted or not adopted the effect is just the same as to my proposition. Then the question is, there being but one proposition before the House, whether that is to be amended or not amended at all. This question is whether the Senate amendment shall be amended as I propose, and whichever amendment is agreed to it becomes a Senate proposition amended. I think there is no embarrassment in the matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SYMES. I desire to correct the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Chair will hear gentlemen for parliamentary inquiries only.

Mr. TAULBEE. That is my object.

Mr. SYMES. I desire to correct the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. I did reserve the point of order on his substitute.

Mr. TAULBEE. That comes further along. My question is this, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement just made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], he seems to labor under the impression that the correct proceeding is to first vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, as adding to the Senate amendment, and that whether that be adopted or not the vote then recurs on his [Mr. HOLMAN'S] amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, and, if adopted, strikes out the Senate amendment. Am I correct in that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not catch the gentleman's statement. [Laughter.] The Chair has stated his view of the parliamentary position several times and has seen no occasion to change it. The Chair may be wrong, but his opinion is unchanged by any suggestion that has been presented.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe the Chair is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The conclusion of the Chair is sustained by some of the best parliamentarians on the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. I agree with the opinion of the Chair so far as expressed, but my question leads further. It is this: If, according to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the vote is first to be had on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, which is adding to the Senate amendment, then, whether that be adopted or not, the vote recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which is in the nature of a substitute for the Senate amendment, and would have the effect of striking the Senate amendment from the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the Chair has stated that the vote will be taken on the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] first. If that is adopted, the question will then be taken on agreeing to the Senate amendment as amended.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will that retain the Senate amendment in the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will. The House can not disturb the Senate amendment or affect it in any manner other than heretofore stated.

Mr. SYMES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SYMES. I reserved the point of order against the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana, and, as I understood, the Chair ruled it out, so that nothing remained to be voted upon under the demand for the previous question made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] but the Senate amendment as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserved his point of order until the stage should be reached when the substitute would be presented for consideration, but at that time he did not insist upon the point of order, and the Chair presumed that he had waived it. The Chair will state, however, that if the point of order had been made, in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, it would have been overruled; so that the gentleman has lost no right except perhaps the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SYMES. Well, I reserved the point of order. I did not present it then because the Chair said that I could present it thereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the time the substitute was offered for consideration.

Mr. SYMES. I insisted on it then and the Chair ruled it out, as I understood.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not ruled upon that point. The gentleman is entirely in error.

Mr. SYMES. Well, I do not insist. My friends suggest that we take a vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the present attitude of matters and the embarrassment that manifestly surrounds this question, I will submit the amendment which I have already submitted with an additional provision striking out the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RYAN. That is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The modification can be made only by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent when the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that demand will be voted down.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw the demand for the previous question to allow this to come in.

Mr. RYAN. If the demand for the previous question is withdrawn, I renew it.

Mr. SYMES. The object is to defeat this proposition after the House has practically adopted it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 77, noes 32.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of "no quorum." I suggest that the call of the yeas and nays be not now insisted upon. It is quite manifest that there is hardly a quorum present. I suggest that the fair and honorable thing to do, in view of the ruling of the Chair, is to allow this substitute to be brought in just as gentlemen understood it to be in the first instance—that is, as a substitute for the whole proposition.

Mr. PETERS. I think we had better have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the demand of the gentleman from Georgia for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for the yeas and nays takes precedence.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 21, noes 79; more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question being on ordering the previous question, the Clerk proceeded to call the roll; but before the first roll-call was concluded,

Mr. BURNES addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BURNES. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent that I may be heard a moment to state a proposition which I think will tend to facilitate a settlement of this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman at the end of the first roll-call.

Mr. BURNES. It is for the purpose of preventing any further call of the roll that I rise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Missouri will be recognized for the purpose of making a statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident that this roll-call, if completed, will develop the fact that there is not a quorum present, in consequence of which we shall have to adjourn, so that another day will have been lost, and the consideration of this most important of all the appropriation bills will be further delayed. Now, the feeling and judgment of the House have been tested upon the pending proposition. I think from what has taken place the conferees will understand about what is the sentiment of the House. At all events, if there should be a disagreement, there will be another opportunity for considering and voting upon the question. Whether the conferees do one thing or the other, the matter will have to be reported back to the House.

Now, I have risen for the purpose of suggesting that the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered be reconsidered, and that the Breckinridge amendment, or whatever proposition may be agreeable to the majority of the House, be regarded as adopted, without naming any amount, so that the conferees may regard themselves as informed that the judgment of the House is in favor of the subject-matter under consideration, while it is divided with regard to the amount which ought to be appropriated for the prosecution of the work. With this sort of instruction, favorable to the subject-matter, but leaving it with the conferees to negotiate with the Senate as to the amount to be inserted, which action will have to be reported back, the House will be protected; and on that basis I think gentlemen on the two sides of this question ought to be able to agree, so that business may go on.

Mr. BLOUNT. I had hoped that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] would have submitted a different proposition, especially in the light of his statement that the purpose of the House in reference to this subject had been made manifest. The gentleman from Indiana made what seemed to me a reasonable request—to be allowed to modify his motion so as to strike out the appropriation of $250,000 in the Senate amendment. As one of those who are opposed to the Senate amendment, I submit that if we are in the minority, it is quite a small concession on the part of the majority, or so-called majority, to allow us the privilege of voting upon that proposition. I have no objection to permitting the reconsideration of the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, if it be understood that the gentleman from Indiana may modify his proposition as indicated to the House; otherwise, I shall object.

Mr. RYAN and Mr. PETERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being demanded, the Clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The Clerk proceeded with the calling of the roll.

Mr. RYAN. I ask that the order for a call of the yeas and nays be rescinded, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be permitted to modify his motion as suggested, and that we take a vote upon that.

Mr. SYMES. With the understanding that no demand for a quorum shall be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas, by unanimous consent, asks to vacate the order for the yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. Suppose this arrangement should be entered into and on one of the amendments the House should desire to order a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. SYMES. It is the understanding that there is to be no yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not wish to demand a yea-and-nay vote, and I wish to agree to dispense with the roll-call; but the House may desire to put itself upon record by a yea-and-nay vote on some of these amendments. I do not mean to make any point of no quorum, but I wish to preserve the right of the House to have a yea-and-nay vote on any amendment upon which it may be desired.

Mr. RYAN. I made the proposition to facilitate the business, but as it appears it will not facilitate the business at all if there is to be a yea-and-nay vote, which will disclose the fact that there is no quorum present, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered be vacated, and the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to modify his substitute.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to the modification being made, but I do not wish to preclude the House from having a yea-and-nay vote if it should desire to do so on any of these amendments it may choose.

Mr. RYAN. I will withdraw my request.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I hope my friend from Kansas will not withdraw his proposition.

Mr. RYAN. Very well, then, let it stand.

Mr. SYMES. It is with the understanding that there is to be no point made of no quorum.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas to be that the order for the roll-call shall be vacated, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shall have the right to amend his substitute by adding to it a provision striking out the appropriation, and on that a direct vote shall be had. If that is carried, of course it settles it. If it be voted down, then a direct vote will be taken on my amendment. What I wish to say is, even if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] declines to make an agreement he will not call for the yeas and nays. I hope the proposition made by the gentleman from Kansas will be accepted. It will facilitate business. We can have a fair vote on this question, as the gentleman from Indiana desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the order for the yea-and-nay vote be vacated; and further, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shall be allowed to modify his substitute in accordance with the suggestion he has made. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now send up the modification, which I ask to have read.

The Clark read as follows:

And the sum of $250,000 proposed by the amendment of the Senate is stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which has been modified as just reported. The Chair will state, however, that the order did not vacate the demand for the previous question, but if there be no objection it will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let it be understood that that was also withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute of the gentleman from Indiana as modified.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 47, noes 73.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. RYAN. That is not in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. BLOUNT. There was no agreement not to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SYMES. I thought it was understood that we were not to have the yeas and nays. It was represented that the demand would not be made.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 34 members voting in favor of the demand and 26 in opposition.

Mr. SYMES. The understanding, then, has been violated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BLAND. It is evident that there is no quorum present; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now call the roll on the substitute.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 80, not voting 183; as follows:

WEDNESDAY, September 12, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TRUSTS AND COMBINATIONS.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer some amendments, which I regard as of some importance, to Senate bill 3445, the trust bill, which has been reported from the Committee on Finance by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. As my handwriting is a bit difficult to read, I ask leave to read them myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection,

Mr. HOAR. It is impossible to hear the request of the Senator from Mississippi on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks consent to read his own amendments, his handwriting not being very legible.

Mr. GEORGE. I will read them so that they will be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendments I propose to offer to the trust bill are to add the following as additional sections:

SEC. 4. That when any action or suit in law or equity shall be commenced or shall be pending in any court of the United States, it shall be lawful for any defendant therein to except to the jurisdiction of such court upon the ground that the cause of action or suit is for the enforcement of a right based on a contract for the sale, exchange, or transportation, or on any damage arising from any wrong committed in respect to any article of merchandise manufactured, transported, imported, or sold in violation of the provisions of the first section of this act, and if such ground of exception shall be proven to the satisfaction of the court, judgment of dismissal shall be entered with double costs to the defendant, and with such reasonable sum for the attorney's fees for the defense thereof as may be allowed by the court.

SEC. 5. That when the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any arrangement, trust, contract, agreement, or combination as described in the first section of this act has been formed a nd that in consequence thereof there has been a rise in the price of any article of merchandise, he shall have power and it is hereby made his duty to issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on similar articles when imported into the United States from any foreign country. Such suspension shall continue for ninety days after the President, upon being satisfied that such enhancement in price no longer exists, shall issue his proclamation withdrawing his former proclamation of suspension, and the President of the United States may from time to time, as may in his judgment be proper, reissue or withdraw any proclamation he may have issued.

SEC. 6. That when any article of merchandise shall have been raised in price by reason of the unlawful means described in the first section of this act such article when owned by any of the persons, companies, or corporations mentioned in the first section of this act or by any person, corporation, or company claiming or holding either directly or through any number of successive transfers under any of the first-named persons, companies, or corporations shall not be the lawful subjects of interstate or foreign commerce and such commerce or transportation is hereby prohibited. It shall be the duty of the President of the United States through the Interstate Commerce Commission and such other agencies as he may see proper to employ to make such investigations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section. To that end every officer of the United States who may be employed in such investigation is hereby authorized to summon witnesses and to examine them under oath, and the said Interstate Commerce Commission shall make all such needful rules and regulations as may be deemed proper to carry out the provisions of this section, which rules and regulations shall, before they go into effect, be approved by the President of the United States. When such commerce and transportation as to any article of merchandise shall have become unlawful under the provisions of this act the aforesaid interdict on the same may be removed whenever the President of the United States shall so proclaim upon his being satisfied that the enhanced price as herein provided against shall no longer exist and that commerce in such article is free and not restrained or affected in any way by reason of the matters mentioned in the first section of this act.

SEC. 7. That whenever it shall appear to the President of the United States that the manufacturers or producers of any article of merchandise or a majority of them in the United States shall not pay in regular weekly wages, in lawful money, to the workmen, artisans, and laborers, excluding superintendents and officials engaged in such manufacture or production, the full sum realized in sales by them in excess of the wholesale price in the city of New York of similar and competing articles manufactured or produced in any foreign country, such wholesale price being diminished by a reduction therefrom of the customs duties on said foreign articles, it shall be his duty to issue his proclamation suspending all duties on such similar articles when imported in excess of 30 per cent. ad valorem, and such suspension shall continue till otherwise ordered by Congress, but no act of Congress shall have the effect to allow the collection of the suspended duties on articles which shall have been imported during the time of such suspension under the proclamation of the President of the United States. He shall also have in respect to the matters of this section all the powers of investigation through officers of the United States provided for in section 6 of this act.

SEC. 8. Every violation of any proclamation issued by the President of the United States under provisions of this act, and every violation of any provision of sections 4, 5, 6, and 7, shall be punished in the same manner and to the same extent as provided for in section 3.

Mr. President, I desire to make some observations in explanation of the amendments which I have offered. The fourth section, being the first which I read, relates to suits in the United States courts. It is a somewhat difficult constitutional problem to determine how far the Congress of the United States may go in the exercise of any direct power to legislate as provided in section 1 of the bill for the suppression of these combinations and trusts. As I have read the authorities—and I can mention some of them—the Supreme Court of the United States seems to have reached finally a conclusion as to the point of time when articles of merchandise become subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and subject to the power of Congress as interstate and foreign commerce. I take it that point of time, as I deduce it from the various decisions of the Supreme Court, among which are Veazie against Moor in 14 Howard, and a very late decision in relation to some logs transported through the State of New Hampshire—I have forgotten the name of the case—is that point of time when the article commences to be transported. If that be true constitutional law, then any provision of law by Congress which undertakes to subject the article to the jurisdiction of Congress because it may become at some future time the subject of interstate and foreign commerce would be unconstitutional.

It is a difficult question, however. I do not mean to pronounce now any positive opinion upon that subject. But for fear that the offering we are now making to the people of the United States upon a subject of very grave importance to them, affecting very seriously their interests, may turn out after all not to be an efficient remedy for this evil, I have seen proper to offer the amendments which I have submitted to the Senate.

The first amendment is an outlawry of all these combinations and trusts so far as seeking remedies in the courts of the United States is concerned. It can not be objected that we can not do that, because if anything is settled in American constitutional law it is that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States within the limits prescribed by the Constitution depends solely upon the action of Congress. Congress may give, Congress may deny any jurisdiction as to any person or as to any class of cases within these limits.

The fifth section relates to a suspension of the collection of tariff duties. My attention was called to that as a remedy against these trusts by a remark which dropped from the eminent Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] several months ago. It is known that the facility for forming these trusts arises out of the fact that a high duty is imposed on the articles concerning which the trust is formed. The manufacturers instead of allowing the people of th s country to have the benefit of that reduction of prices which comes from a fair, an honest, and a business-like competition between the producers of this country, the producers and manufacturers themselves, in order to evade and avoid that result, combine and fix the price just below the price at which importations can be made. A just and a fair and a complete remedy, and I think an efficient remedy, would be that suggested by the Senator from Ohio, to reduce the duties in cases of that sort.

I have provided in this amendment that when such proof is made to the President of such combination he shall issue his proclamation and the duty shall be suspended until the normal condition of affairs shall be resumed. There can be no doubt about the constitutionality of that provision, nor can there be any doubt about its efficiency.

So up to this point we have an outlawry from the courts of the United States of men who thus violate the laws of trade and thus abuse the privileges granted to them by the tariff laws of the United States. They themselves having declared themselves, or having become hostes humani generis, enemies of the people of the whole country, they have no right whilst they occupy that relation to demand from this same people protection for their rights under the laws which they have violated, and through the courts of the country, whose interests they conspire to destroy.

Section 6 prohibits interstate and foreign commerce in trust articles. I will state the difference between section 1 and this section. Whilst I fear section 1 might be declared unconstitutional, for the reasons which I have before stated, there can be no doubt that when the article becomes or begins to be a part of interstate or foreign commerce by being delivered to a common carrier to be transported from one State to another or from the United States to a foreign country, at that very instant the jurisdiction of the United States commences, and that section is framed with the view of furnishing a remedy in that aspect of the case.

Section 7 is no less important than the others. It is true, it is not strictly germane to the other provisions of the bill. It does not relate to trusts, but it does relate to a very important class of our people who are mainly injured by these trusts, and I think for that reason might well be associated with the other provisions of the bill.

It is claimed—I am not going now into a discussion whether that claim is just or not—that high protective duties are the cause of high wages to workmen. It is claimed that these high protective duties should be laid for the purpose of enabling the workmen to be paid high wages. On the other side it is denied that such a result follows.

The object of the seventh section, therefore, is that this claim of protection on the ground that the tariff duty is expended by the manufacturers in increased wages to the laborers shall be made good, or, in other words, that where a majority of the manufacturers and producers of a particular article in the United States, having protection under the tariff law, decline to give their workmen and laborers who are engaged in this production and in this manufacture the benefit of the tariff thus levied in their name and for their alleged benefit, then this provision of the amendment requires the President not to take away entirely, but to reduce the protection to 30 per cent.

These, sir, are the provisions of the amendments, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and also printed in ordinary bill form. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Finance, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar. The amendments will be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to make an observation or two in regard to the same matter to which the Senator from Mississippi has addressed himself.

We have heard of late in the Senate and from other very distinguished sources of information and suggestion a good deal about the matter of trusts. At the same time there has been a most singular absence of specification in regard to these trusts. I am not aware that in regard to any of the trusts which have attracted the attention of the country and have created the discontent that calls for a remedy, there has been anything said on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber or their political associates elsewhere.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] addressed the Senate in an elaborate written speech a few days ago, and I hoped we should get some light as to what these trusts were, where they were, what their relation was to great political parties, what the likelihood was of their being not merely a danger to the public in the way of increasing prices but a political danger. But no light seems to come.

Now, I wish the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Mississippi would tell the Senate what information they have. Is there a Standard Oil Trust, for instance, in this country or not? Is the Standard Oil Company one of the trusts which the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Texas want to have suppressed? If there be such a trust, is it represented in the Cabinet at this moment? Is it represented in the Senate? Is it represented in the councils of any important political party in this country? These gentlemen certainly have not assumed the position of enlighteners of mankind on this interesting question without having investigated that matter and having got an opinion about it which would be exceedingly useful to us.

Is there a sugar trust in the country, and have its representatives been consulted in the framing of a great revenue tariff, and had their interests specially looked out for and considered by the representatives of a powerful political party in this country in the framing of the measure which is to tax or affect the article on which every laboring man in this country I think pays more than he does for his flour? What can the Senator from Texas tell us about that? What can the Senator from Mississippi tell us about that? St. Paul said, "When I fight" (or rather the real Greek word which he used is, "When I box"), "I strike not as one that beateth the air;" "I hit somebody," was the apostle's boast, in substance. I should like to have these gentlemen tell us if there is a sugar trust in this country, and if it is likely to have got such power not only over prices but over legislation that it takes a great political party in this country and compels it to frame a tariff in its interest and tax every American citizen, every American household on one of the great necessaries of life in accordance with its dictation and its interest.

Is there a cotton-oil and cotton-seed trust in this country? Where is that found at work? Does the Senator from Mississippi know something about that? He is a cotton man. He and the Senator from Texas both come from cotton States. Give us a little detail so that we shall be ready for this legislation when it comes.

Is there a whisky trust in the country? Where is that at work in politics just now, and is that anything of a danger?

Is there an anthracite-coal trust? Where is that at work? Is there danger from that?

I listened to the Senator's amendment, in which he proposes to attack those trusts or supposed trusts which are connected with manufactures on which there is a protective duty. If one such trust be found in the country, I understand he is willing to put the enormous power in the hands of the Executive of altering the tariff of this country (a power which the framers of the Constitution denied to the Senate even the right to propose, leaving it only to the Representatives of the people), so as to strike down every honest manufacturer throughout the country who is engaged in the same business.

Does it not occur to the Senator from Mississippi that it might be well to include some of these trusts that I have mentioned, some of which, notably the whisky trust, the cotton-seed and cotton-oil trust, the anthracite-coal trust, and the Standard Oil trust, are not protected by tariffs? Why does the Senator steer so carefully in his proposed legislation not to hit these great trusts which stand to the Democratic party at this moment, as a great portion of the people believe, in the relation of Treasury and of Executive control both?

I do not think that it will turn out, on reflection, to be a good plan to put in the hands of a Chief Executive Magistrate of this country (who notoriously owes his election to the aid of the grossest interest of such a trust that exists on the face of the earth, and who has it represented in his Cabinet) the power to strike at these things and to control them and to affect the revenues of the country and the tariff legislation by his unsupported will. It is a good deal like setting the cat to watch the cream, if I may use a homely metaphor.

There is another trust about which I should like to have a little information. There is a gentleman whose name I shall not call, for I do not want to have the suggestion made that I am violating any rule of courtesy or parliamentary law, who is understood to be the most powerful and trusted counselor in directing the campaign of the Democratic party in this country at this moment. When he walks from the White House down Pennsylvania avenue after he has spent an hour or two at the White House he is very apt to have a bill in his pocket on some important political matter, and the bill is very apt to get through somewhere by a unanimous vote of the same party, and it is very apt to be pressed through here until the mistake or blunder is found out.

I should like to know whether the gentleman to whom I have referred has any relation to any of these great trusts that affect the transporting interests, or the coal interests, or any other interests in this country—the trust which puts its tax upon the fire of every workingman in the winter, the trust which can increase the freight he pays for every article of necessity or comfort in the summer, or upon the fare he pays when he travels from place to place on business or recreation. The Senator from Texas knows all about this trust. Who is managing it? What party keeps it up? What party profits by it? I hope we shall get a few of the facts and details of this matter before the committee is ready to report.

Is there a fruit trust, and where is that?

I ask the Secretary of the Senate to read at the top of the ninety-fourth page from the Congressional Directory.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TWENTY-SEVENTH DISTRICT.

[Counties.—Erie, Venango, and Warren.]

WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Erie, was born in the city of Washington, D. C., July 2, 1828, his parents being residents of Virginia; he received a common school education; served as page in the House of Representatives from 1840 to 1846; settled in Erie, Pa., in 1848, and was employed as a clerk in the shipping business; engaged in 1850 in the coal and shipping business, owning and running several vessels on the lakes; subsequently became largely interested in the manufacture of iron and the mining of coal, as well as in the construction and operation of railroads, either as president or director of various lines, aggregating over 22,000 miles of completed road, the greatest number of miles of railroad, probably, which any one individual was ever an officer or director of; was a district delegate to the national Democratic convention held in the city of New York in 1868, and a delegate at large from the State of Pennsylvania to the Democratic national convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1880, and also represented the State of Pennsylvania on the Democratic national committee from 1876 to 1884; was elected mayor of the city of Erie in 1866, and again in 1871; was elected to the Forty-ninth and re-elected to the Fiftieth Congress as a Democrat, receiving 14,787 votes against 13,574 votes for Mackey, Republican, and 2,140 votes for Andrews, Prohibitionist.

Mr. HOAR. Twenty-two thousand miles of railroad—just think of it—in the service of the Democratic party in this election, more than all the railroads in Great Britain and France put together, if I am correct in my memory. I understand that part of it is in Canada, and I do not wonder that the Canadian minister who negotiated the late treaty went home and told the Canadian Parliament that he was told by the Democratic Secretary of State that the House of Representatives and the great Democratic party in this country proposed to do exactly what Canada desired, according to the report of Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. President, I do not profess to be an expert in this matter. I am one of the plain, simple people who pay the taxes. But the Senator from Texas is the great lover of the people; he spends his time and grows thin and spare when he thinks of the wrongs of the people at the hands of these trusts, metaphorically I mean, not actually. He will tell us all about these questions that I have asked, and when he has got through telling us I am going to ask him a few more, if he will be good enough to answer these first. I want to know the facts about these five or six great trusts, which are sufficient in their power to overthrow any government in Europe, if they existed in those nations, that should set itself against them, the coal, the sugar, the whisky, the cotton, the fruit, the railroad transportation of this country, controlled by these giant chieftains, manipulated in the interest of the Democratic party and the present Administration, represented in Cabinet and Senate, the chairman of their national committee one of the same sort. I do not wonder that gentlemen are working up the attention of the American people to this gigantic danger. I said they would overthrow any country in Europe, and it is only a country whose destinies are in the hands of 15,000,000 of freemen, each with his free and equal vote, that will be able to defend itself against them and put them down.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I introduced a bill some time ago which had for its object to define trusts and provide for punishing those connected with them. On the same day the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] introduced another bill on the same subject and having the same object in view.

It did not occur to me that the introduction of a bill was the time to explain its provisions, its meaning, and all the facts which inspired its introduction, as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts seems to have supposed was the case. I supposed when a bill on this subject was reported and was before the Senate for consideration would be the time at which to discuss it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Texas pardon me? I judge from what he said just now that he assumes I began this debate.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, I was not talking about who began it.

Mr. HOAR. It was begun by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not talking about that. I supposed that the time for the discussion of this question would be when a bill comes up for consideration in the Senate. I made no objection if a Senator chooses to make some explanatory remarks in introducing a bill; I know that is customary; but it is not customary to go into an elaborate discussion if the question before it is up for consideration and before the time when Senators have had an opportunity to consider the subject.

The Senator from Massachusetts is anxious that I should give an explanation about these trusts, of what constituted and by whom managed; and he seems to have a special distress on account of the management of trusts by Democratic politicians. I am sorry that a question which affects the interests of the great body of the American people can not be treated as a question affecting the interests of the people and deserving of a remedy without attempting to make a party issue out of it. I do not undertake to say whether Democrats or Republicans are connected with these trusts, nor do I care. My purpose is to get a law that will punish either Democrat or Republican who engages in this business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator not make his own speech on this subject the other day as an attack on Mr. Blaine?

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator made an allusion of that kind before. I made no such speech nor any speech having that object in view at all. I made a speech upon the injurious effects of our tariff legislation on the industrial and labor interests of the country. That was the object of the speech; and the only reference I made to trusts at all was to refer to an expression made by a distinguished American citizen the day before excusing and defending trusts, and if I would follow the example set me by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts I would say a Republican politician had defended and excused trusts in a measure. I simply referred to that to dissent from what had been said. I made no pretense to discuss the question of trusts whatever. I did not have that object in view, and it only occurred to me at the very time the discussion was going on.

All I desire to say now is to protest that I have not been called upon nor have I undertaken to discuss the question of trusts, and I do not intend to do so until a bill comes up for consideration, when if it is found convenient and I think I can do anything to enlighten the subject I shall be disposed to do so.

The Senator from Massachusetts quoted from St. Paul about the impropriety of fighting in the air and about the propriety of striking somebody when he fought. Whom did he strike in these trusts? Has he told the Senate whether he would favor them or oppose them? There has been a good deal of talk with a view of giving a partisan trend to this subject, and when that question comes up for consideration, if the Senator chooses to take that line he will get enough of it. I assure him now that he will get enough of it if he undertakes to make a partisan issue of it.

My purpose is, and it is the only purpose I have in view, to arrest if possible the great evils that afflict this country. The Senator does not overstate them when he states they are sufficient to overturn any government in Europe, and if they are not arrested they will overturn this Government as inevitably as the night follows the day. It is for the purpose of trying to arrest them that I propose to act, not as a Democrat, not to affect Republicans, not to affect Democrats, but to affect any man who violates the laws of trade and the rights of the American people, I do not care to what party he belongs.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate proceeds by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. I desire permission to say a few words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I asked the Senator from Texas if he would be good enough to answer some five or six questions?

Mr. REAGAN. I say to the Senator now that I do not care to be catechised. I am not entering upon a debate of this question, and I shall not participate in a debate of it until it comes up in proper order.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator made an elaborate speech on this subject.

Mr. REAGAN. I tell the Senator now that I never made a speech on the subject. I only made an incidental reference to the subject.

Mr. HOAR. Here is the speech of the Senator which I have in my hand, from which I shall read, if he will pardon me. Let us see. The Senator from Texas rose the other day in a state of considerable, I will not say excitement, but zeal, righteous indignation, to comment on a declaration made by an eminent citizen of the United States now in private life, formerly a candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency, in regard to trusts. The Senator gave us an elaborate discourse on that subject, as I understood, and I heard him. I was therefore moved when the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] made his remarks on this subject to ask the Senator from Texas, who might be getting ready to act on this legislation, the facts as he knew them in his opinion on five or six questions.

He could not have been blind to contemporary history in this country. He could not have made that speech without having thought all about and known all about, as far as he could, the questions to which I asked an answer. I wanted to know what he could tell us about the Standard Oil trust, and where its representatives were, what they were doing with the Democratic party to-day, the sugar trust, the cotton-oil and cotton-seed trust, the whisky trust, and this great railroad control; and the Senator, instead of answering that question, says that he is not going to be catechised, and he deplores that in regard to this great and melancholy evil, which causes him so much grief, anybody should undertake to introduce a partisan consideration of it, and talk about parties.

Here is an extract from that Senator's speech, "Speech of Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, August 16, 1888," made when no human being had alluded to the subject before, as far as I know. This is a copy of the speech which I suppose I received by his courtesy, which is always abounding, for, as we all know, he is one of the most courteous men alive. I received it from some one so that I might read it. This gentleman, who thinks it is dreadful that there should be any partisanship or mention of party in this great sober consideration, in the time of this Democratic funeral which is going on in this country, to be talking about party!

Can there be a doubt as to which side of this question the majority of the intelligent and patriotic voters of this country will adopt?

There is much reason to congratulate the country on the professed reforms of political principles which the Democracy has compelled the Republican party to adopt as a last means of saving that party from further defeat.

That is, I suppose the Senator means, with these six great trusts, which cover everything as with a great blanket in this country.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOAR. As soon as I have finished the extract.

We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise to control arbitrarily the condition of trade among our citizens.

They did not know—

The Senator goes on—

What Mr. Blaine would say on that.

Then he quotes the Republican platform further, and goes on—

That beats audacity itself, and I do not know what name to call it.

And these six great trust-owners, all Democratic, have compelled the Republican party to insert in its platform a declaration of opposition to trusts. I should think they might very well. As I said before, they constitute its treasury, they constitute its support, they constitute its executive management and control. The Democratic party is like a great artichoke. You cut off the outer peel, and there is another one just like it, and so you peel and peel and peel, and it is trust, trust, trust, trust, trust, trust from outer shell to inner core, and I do not wonder that it has compelled the Republican party to express its objection to it. Then the Senator goes on—

The votes and speeches of Republican Senators and Representatives in Congress—

Remember, this was not in debate, this was the introduction of the subject, when the Senate laid aside its business to enable the Senator from Texas to go on with a set speech—from the time that party came into power until the present, and the action of the Executive Departments at all times when under the control of that party, will show to any one who will take the trouble to investigate them that the foregoing declarations of principle are in direct conflict with the recorded action of that party for many years past, and that they may now be regarded as a sort of death-bed confession of past political sins.

In view of the conflict between the recorded action of the Republican party and the foregoing declarations, we may congratulate the country on the success of the Democratic party in educating Republicans up to the point of making such declarations of principle. If they are only hypocritically made in the effort to be successful in the approaching election, still such action is a tribute to the virtue and soundness of Democratic principles.

There is nothing partisan in that, as my friend on my left [Mr. ALLISON] observes.

The Hon. James G. Blaine, who has just returned from luxuriating in the splendid castle of Mr. Carnegie in Scotland—

Nothing partisan in that—the prize extorted from American labor by a protective tariff, has taken upon himself the task of showing how little President Cleveland knows about tariffs, and trusts, and statesmanship generally.

He goes on:

And now, Mr. Blaine, who is the guiding spirit of the Republican party in the pending campaign, true to his past record, and a true representative of his party and of its past history, has taken on himself, in his speech in Portland, Me., of yesterday, to ridicule Mr. Cleveland's reference to the evils and dangers of trusts. And in his rôle of defender of protection, of corporations, of aggregations of capital of all kinds, he poses as the apologist and defender of trusts.

When I asked the Senator about these great and notorious facts of our current history relating to the very subject he was talking about, he turns around with a pious exhortation to banish politics from the consideration of this important question!

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusets commenced reading to show that I had in that speech introduced the subject of trusts first, and he read that paragraph. If he had read the entire speech, he would have known that it applied to the whole field of discussion of class legislation. I had reviewed, as I understood it, to some extent, the history of class legislation as carried on by the Republican party on various subjects. It was to that I referred in asking the question as to which side the intelligent voters of the United States would act with, and I was not dealing specially with the subject of trusts. I objected to the partisan turn the Senator wanted to give to this subject in advance of the discussion of the question. I have no objection, if he sees proper to go into it when the question comes up, to see what party in this country is responsible for this class legislation, and I promise the Senator if he provokes that, I will show facts from the record running through years to sustain the declaration which I have made there.

The Senator speaks of the Democratic funeral. Perhaps he had better wait until the funeral procession starts to know whose funeral it is.

Mr. HOAR. It started from Oregon and Vermont and Maine.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think anybody has been surprised at the result in Vermont and in Maine and very little surprised at the result in Oregon. I might turn to the State of Arkansas, that has had an election recently, and ask if the Senator feels discouraged at the result in Arkansas; but I do not. I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate now in such references. I simply desire to protest that the Senator has misconceived the object of the speech I made, and that I have not attempted the discussion of the special subject of trusts. The object of that speech in a great measure was to show the evil effects of our tariff legislation and of class legislation generally, and I made it a point to arraign as best I could the Republican party for being responsible for that; and whenever it becomes necessary I will attempt to make good what I said.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. President, I have a feeling of kindly sympathy with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. The "Standard Oil Company" seems to trouble his mind and will probably trouble it during all his life, unless he can be relieved in some proper way of responsibility for it. Even at this day it seems that that company is represented as being guilty of all sorts of unlawful and improper things. Such allegations, without proof to sustain them, I regard as unworthy of an honorable man or an honorable Senator. Now, a brief statement perhaps will relieve the Senator's mind. I have no doubt he delights in uttering before the Senate an insinuation that that company has a representative in this body, and he never will be happy until that impression is removed from his mind.

To begin with, let me say that there is nothing whatever to sustain the insinuation which the honorable Senator conveys. I make the declaration now for the first time, and it will be the last time I shall ever take notice of it.

The Standard Oil Company is a very remarkable and wonderful institution. It has accomplished within the last twenty years as a commercial enterprise what no other company or association of modern times has accomplished; but, Mr. President, I never had a dollar's interest in that company; I never owned a dollar of its stock; I never rendered it any service, and that company never rendered me any service. On the contrary, when a candidate for the other House in 1871, no institution, no association, no combination in my district did more to bring about my defeat and went to so large an expense in money to accomplish it as the Standard Oil Company. I never was in their works but once, and then, in company with the late General Devereaux, as an escort to a gentleman, a distinguished stranger from Russia. So much for myself.

As a matter of fact nine-tenths of the stockholders of the Standard Oil Company are now, and always have been, Republicans. Within my knowledge there are but two Democrats who have ever been stockholders in that company. Not only are the majority Republicans, but they are very liberal in their philanthropic contributions to charities and benevolent works, and I venture the assertion that two gentlemen in that company have donated more money for philanthropic and for benevolent purposes than all the Republican members of the Senate put together.

So, then, if there is any politics in that organization, they are Republican politics. There never has been a national election in which those two gentlemen to whom I refer have not contributed very liberally; at the same time they have contributed liberally to the Prohibition or the "anti-saloon" organization which my honorable friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], so ably represents.

I do not know that I need go any further in that matter. If the Standard Oil Company has done anything wrong, it is a corporation under the laws of Ohio, without any exclusive privileges and opportunities; if it has done anything immoral, oppressive, or unjust, I am as free as any other citizen of that State to demand that it shall be held accountable.

As to that corporation being represented in the Cabinet, I hardly know what to say. It is a mere insinuation, unmanly and untruthful, and such as only could be expected from the lower class of stumpers, and I think it not deserving of further notice here.

Now, one word further. I do not know one of these trusts to-day that is under the controlling management of Democrats. One reason is the Democrats generally have not had money enough to engage in these trusts, and I might say with reference to Colonel SCOTT, whom I have known many years and have been associated with him in various enterprises, that he, a very intelligent and enterprising gentleman, has had connection with numerous companies. The two principal lines of railroad in which he has been interested as a stockholder and director are the "Canada Pacific" and the New York Central lines of roads, and he has had an associate in the latter, Mr. Depew. As to the Canada Pacific, I suppose I need not name a distinguished gentleman who has been associated with him in the directory of that company. He is a gentleman of the highest respectability, and is the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States.

Insinuations that Colonel SCOTT "traveled down from the White House to the House of Representatives with a draughted bill," etc., I utterly discredit. I have inquired in my own way without success to find a single particle of evidence to sustain it. Such charges might do on the stump or in a political harangue, but I submit that it is unworthy a distinguished and leading Senator on this floor to make public such insinuations against honorable men. As to that I forbear further comment.

This bill I have not considered. It has been referred to the Committee on Finance. No doubt it will receive due consideration, and I think there should be no political differences in the effort to guard against the abuses and influences of these trusts. I hope each side, if there be sides, will vie with the other in endeavoring to provide some efficient protection against the evils of trusts.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. If I understood him correctly—he spoke in a low tone of voice—I understood him to say that the Standard Oil Company had exerted itself against his election?

Mr. PAYNE. When I was a candidate for the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator refer to the time when he was a candidate for the Senate?

Mr. PAYNE. I will include that, if I did not include it before. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will allow me, as I suppose I am relieving his mind from a great deal of useless anxiety, that not one dollar or one cent directly or indirectly was contributed to my election to this body by the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. HOAR. Who were the stockholders? The Senator manifested a great knowledge of the stockholders. He said there were two Democrats among them.

Mr. PAYNE. One of them was my own son and the other Colonel Thompson. Those are the only Democrats that were ever stockholders in that company as far as my knowledge extends.

Mr. HOAR. They are very influential in the Democratic councils. I should like to ask the Senator another question, and that is, if it is not true that the Standard Oil Company has been able to get very large advantages in the way of railroad transportation over any other manufacturers of similar articles?

Mr. PAYNE. I will answer as far as I know. I know that at one time, in Saratoga, one of the managers of the oil company met in conference the representatives of the New York Central and the Pennsylvania Railroads and discussed the question of freights, but I know nothing of the results of the interview.

Mr. HOAR. That was not my question. My question was whether in the transportation of their manufactured products they had not had large advantages by transportation by rail over other manufacturers?

Mr. PAYNE. I know they have had very extensive dealings, and I know at one time they constructed, in order to conduct their shipping business, over a thousand cars. I know from general report that at another time they constructed several hundred if not several thousand miles of pipe, in order to make themselves independent of the railroads. I only know these things from report.

Mr. HOAR. We get some very remarkable admissions from the Senator from Ohio, which I think will interest the country. One is of a very remarkable and considerable knowledge on his part of the private affairs of this company. He says he has not any personal interest. Another is, that two of its most important managers are persons who were among the most influential and important managers of his election to the Senate, according to the evidence which has been laid before the Senate. Third, a confession on his own part that that company did take an earnest and active part in politics. He says it was taken in opposition to his election to the other House. I think if that company had taken an active part in politics on one side, it would have been very likely to have its vast weight felt on the other.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know that I understand the Senator very distinctly. I did not admit that any one member of the Standard Oil Company had contributed to my election to this body, nor do I know that any member of that company ever contributed a dollar to my election. The Senator must have been laboring in his Copiah, Miss., imagination on these matters to discolor and distort the facts. I know he has been troubled in that way for a long time. He certainly has had experience enough and is sensible enough to rise above the low demagogic motives that may control others.

I know something of this company, to be sure, because it is in my own town; it originated there, and I know the members of it. For many years before they left Ohio they were my neighbors, and I know from public reports and from what I have seen that we have had no two gentlemen in the State of Ohio who have been as liberal as they have, and it is to their credit, and their success is due to their wonderful sagacity as managers of this corporation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2726) granting an increase of pension to Margaret S. Heintzelman, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHIPMAN, Mr. THOMPSON of California, and Mr. THOMPSON of Ohio managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1959) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue to the governor of the Territory of Montana military stores for the use of the regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates;

A bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 10856) for pension for Eliza N. Aiken; and

A bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

DEATH OF JOSEPH HOFFMAN, WASHINGTON COUNTY, TEXAS.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, is it in order to introduce a resolution at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are in order.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to offer a resolution, but before sending it to the desk I ask the consent of the Senate to make a brief explanation of the purposes of the resolution and the motives which lead to its introduction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has that right under the rules.

Mr. SPOONER. As a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections it became my duty under the order of the Senate and the direction of the committee to investigate during the last session of Congress, in conjunction with other members of the committee, some alleged election outrages in Washington County, Texas. It was to me an exceedingly disagreeable duty. If there is a partisanship in the United States which gloats over the existence of outrage and cruelty and bloodshed as to elections in any part of the country as a source of political capital I have no sympathy with it; but I believe in the rights of citizenship; that men who under the Constitution of the United States have a right to vote should be maintained in that right whether they live in the North or in the South, whether they are white men or are black men—the black man just as much as the white man—and whether they vote the Democratic ticket or the Republican ticket. I therefore went about the work as an important duty. I do not intend to say a word at this time—for I should not regard it as proper—of the testimony taken by the committee in its effect or as to conclusions upon it. That will come later. There came before that committee one day as a witness, brought here by subpœna, a man by the name of Joseph Hoffman, a clear-eyed, clear-faced, brainy, brave man, if one could judge of the characteristics of the man from his appearance, and his testimony was careful and cautious, but outright and unequivocating. He was not a negro; he was a white man, a German, a Republican, living in Washington County, Texas. In all the testimony there was no whisper against his character. He had been elected, I think, nine times the assessor of that county, and at the election which we were investigating, when what was called the "People's ticket," by methods which are yet to be discussed, succeeded, he alone of all the men on the Republican ticket was elected.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. Has the Senator made a report of that investigation?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to suggest to the Senator that it strikes me it is very remarkable, and this is the second time the Senator is discussing that testimony, when he has not dared to make a report of the facts and has given others no opportunity to know what they are. I suggest that it is unfair and unjust for him, as the chairman of that subcommittee, to come into the Senate a second time to discuss the facts of the case, when the testimony is before him and he does not report it to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, in the first place, I am not chairman of the subcommittee. In the second place, the Senator from Texas will be in better position to intelligently criticise what I am about to say if he will content himself in patience until I have said it.

I am not committing any breach of propriety in simply stating the fact that Joseph Hoffman was elected assessor of Washington County, Texas, at that election, and took an oath and entered upon the discharge of the duties of that office. Does the Senator object to my stating that fact?

Mr. REAGAN. I think I have a just right to object to a second discussion of this question when the Senator holds the testimony in his hands and will not report it to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I will proceed, Mr. President, with what I desire to say and let the Senate judge when I am through whether I am abusing the privileges of the Senate and the rights of a Senator.

This witness was discharged for the time being. At a later day and at the beginning of this session of Congress that committee found it necessary to take additional testimony, and the committee was authorized by the Senate to take the additional testimony. Among other witnesses subpœnaed to testify before the committee was Joseph Hoffman. He did not make his appearance in obedience to the subpœna, because, as he stated to the officer of the Senate who served him with the subpœna, he did not dare to come here and testify as a witness before the Senate committee again.

He stated as a reason why he did not obey that subpœna that he had been threatened with death for having testified before, and therefore he did not dare to appear again. He is dead, Mr. President. Six days ago he was shot down like a dog, his body filled with buckshot, at Brenham, the county seat of his home county, and such a home county for him, a free American citizen! He can not answer any more the subpœna of any tribunal here.

I first learned of the fact that Joseph Hoffman had been killed by this statement in the newspapers:

Riddled with buckshot.

The Senator from South Carolina sneers at it.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is exaggerating his own importance immensely if he supposes I was paying any attention whatever to what he says.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not assume that the Senator from South Carolina was paying any attention to me.

Mr. BUTLER. Not the slightest.

Mr. SPOONER. If I had assumed for a moment that a matter of this character would be deemed entitled to the least consideration or importance in that direction, I confess my error.

Mr. BUTLER. I do consider it entitled to importance at the proper time. I think there are proper occasions when these things may be presented.

Mr. SPOONER. Whether this is a proper occasion or not——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is magnifying his own importance and his dramatic power before the Senate immensely if he supposed I was concerned about it. I simply want to say that, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg to say to the Senator from South Carolina that my remark was not because I assumed that I possessed any importance in his eye——

Mr. BUTLER. It looked so.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a matter of utter indifference to me, however, whether I did or not, or what his estimate is.

I was about to read this dispatch which appeared in the newpapers:

RIDDLED WITH BUCKSHOT.

BRENHAM, TEX., September 7.

At 10.45 o'clock last night, while several gentlemen were standing on the doorstep of Murphy's saloon, on the east side of the court-house square, heavy charges of buckshot were fired into the crowd from the southeast corner of the court-house, about 75 feet away. J. I. Hoffman, a Democratic nominee for county assessor, was instantly killed, and J. H. Holt, brother of O. T. Holt, Texas member of the Democratic national committee, and himself an active worker for the same ticket, was dangerously wounded. Mr. Holt was struck with twelve buckshot. Hoffman and one other candidate were the only nominees of the Democratic party who have not been indorsed by the Republicans. Holt and Hoffman had received warnings that if they did not keep quiet they would be put out of the way.

I was surprised, Mr. President, when I read that article to see it stated that Joe Hoffman, a witness before that committee, had become a Democrat or was a candidate for office upon the Democratic ticket. That was explained to me, however, by a letter which I hold in my hand received yesterday, a letter from Mr. Hackworth, dated Topeka, Kans., one of the gentlemen upon whose petition this investigation was ordered. I will ask the Secretary to read this letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read it, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., September 8, 1888.

DEAR SIR: The above clipping from the Associated Press dispatches explains itself.

I have received no news from my brother and Republican friends at Brenham, Tex., in regard to this horrible outrage. I suppose that the unfortunate condition of affairs of 1886 is now being re-enacted in Washington County, Texas, and that my friends there are now surrounded by well armed bands of "Kuklux" assassins and State troops; consequently they can not and dare not communicate with me over the wires or otherwise.

The above statement that Mr. Hoffman was a Democratic nominee for county assessor is an unqualified falsehood. Some two months ago some of the leading "Kuklux" Democrats waited upon Mr. Hoffman and informed him "if he would become a candidate for assessor upon the same ticket with Judge Kirk and other present 'Kuklux' officials of Washington County he would have no opposition, but if he became an opposition candidate he would be murdered." This he refused to do, and after he and other leading Republicans of the county had corresponded with me I advised them to form a combination ticket with leading law-abiding Democrats, thus avoiding making a straight party fight and uniting the law-abiding elements of the county, irrespective of politics, to oust the present "Kuklux" officials from office.

My advice was followed, the following ticket was nominated, namely: J. E. Gray (Democrat) for county judge, T. J. A. Walt (Democrat) for sheriff, C. Zurcher (Republican) for collector, G. W. Breedlove (Democrat) for county treasurer, W. C. Broeche (Mugwump Republican, or Democrat) for county clerk, Joseph Hoffman (Republican) for county assessor, W. H. Blount (colored Republican) for representative, W. H. Vinson (Democrat) for county attorney, and P. Simmons (Democrat) for county clerk. The last two named candidates withdrew, because they were satisfied that the Kuklux would resort to murder, if necessary, to maintain political power. The Kuklux Democratic ticket is as follows: L. Kirk, county judge, N. E. Dever for sheriff, H. M. Lewis, county clerk, S. Schlenker for collector, C. Minkwitz for treasurer, C. Herbst, district clerk, E. G. Langhammer for county assessor, and B. S. Rogers, county attorney. The combination ticket, composed of Republicans and Democrats, was making splendid headway, and if a free and fair election could be had, this ticket would be elected by at least 2,500 majority. The murder of Mr. Hoffman will now probably cause the Republicans and all law-abiding Democrats of Washington County to abandon the canvass and remain away from the polls on day of coming election. For this and no other purpose the murder of Mr. Hoffman has been brought about. The "Kuklux" Democrats concluded it was best to adopt this method rather than to commit robbery of ballot boxes, and thus subject themselves to indictment and prosecution in the Federal courts.

Mr. James Holt, who was shot with Mr. Hoffman, was a fearless Democrat, and opposed to the election of the Kuklux ticket.

Last year he gave Judge Kirk a sound thrashing, and would have killed him but for the interference of other parties, and not long since he also gave B. S. Rogers, county attorney, a sound thrashing; hence this explains why Mr. Holt was assassinated at the same time with Mr. Hoffman. The Associated Press dispatches of Texas and other Southern States seem to be wholly controlled by the Kuklux leaders, and in many of the recent outrages perpetrated by the Kuklux upon Republicans the Associated Press dispatches make it appear that these outrages were committed by Republicans upon Democrats.

I also send you the inclosed letter, written me by Mr. Hoffman on 16th ultimo, from which you will readily perceive that he knew the dangers confronting him, and that his life might be sacrificed at any time. This letter, together with this communication, you are at liberty to make public, if you deem it advisable to do so.

Mr. Hoffman was a native of Ohio (German Jew), and in 1863, when he was only fourteen years of age, he ran away from his parents and enlisted in the Federal service as a drummer boy, and was in General Sherman's army in his famous march "from Atlanta to the sea." He came to Texas in 1870, and has been an active Republican ever since, up to the time of his death. Since 1878 he has been the regular nominee of the Republican party of Washington County for assessor of taxes at every election held since then, and has been continuously in office since 1878 up to the time of his death. In 1886 he was the only Republican candidate of Washington County who still had a majority of votes after the Kuklux had destroyed the three ballot-boxes at Graball, Flewellen's, and Lott's Store, where at least 600 Republican majority was lost, and by the throwing out of at least 500 Republican ballots by Democratic election officers at other polling places in the county the Republicans lost a total of 1,100 votes. Mr. Hoffman's wife died last July, leaving him with a large family of nine children, who are now by his death left orphans. I feel somewhat responsible for his death, because some three months ago he wanted to leave Texas, and asked me to issue a circular addressed to the Republicans of Washington County advising them to take no part in the present political campaign.

This I refused to do, and advised him to remain in Texas; to organize the Republicans, and to make an active canvass for the combination ticket, which advice he followed.

No words of mine can express my sorrow and regret, but letters I have received during the past ten months from Democrats and Republicans of Washington County led me to believe that a combination ticket would be triumphant and that the Kuklux would not dare to resort to violence.

In Fort Bend County, Texas, which is the last remaining county under Republican ascendency, the Kuklux are now expelling Republicans, and ere this reaches you it is probable that scores of Republicans will have been murdered or expelled from that county.

THE WINCHESTER IS KING.

RICHMOND, TEX., September 7.

The negroes ordered to leave the Fort Bend country for the attempted assassination of H. H. Frost, will resist. A committee of six citizens went out to Jack and Tom Taylor, 15 miles from Richmond, in a stronghold of five hundred negroes, to notify them that they had ten hours in which to leave the country. They declined to leave, defying the whites. One of the committee returned to town and reported the decision of the Taylors. While the others remained on guard, forty men armed with Winchesters have gone out to enforce the order. C. M. Ferguson, the offensive negro district clerk, has gone to the Taylor neighborhood. Matters have assumed such a serious phase that two local military companies have been called into service, and Governor Ross has ordered the State rangers to Fort Bend County.

THREE HUNDRED TEXANS IN ARMS.

RICHMOND, TEX., September 7.

At a late hour last night a dispatch was received here from Thompson Switch, saying that Rufe Lave, a notorious negro agitator, had purchased all the cartridges in that vicinity, and had advised the negroes to arm themselves and prepare to defend their lives and property. A posse immediately formed and proceeded to the place on horseback. Thirty-two armed men are patrolling the town. Three hundred men with arms are ready to respond to the first alarm.

The above dispatches from Richmond, Tex., explain themselves, and show that Governor Ross is following in the footsteps of his predecessor, Governor Ireland, in sending State troops into Republican counties to aid the Kuklux in carrying out their hellish purposes.

I submit all of the above facts as further evidence of the truth of allegations made in petition of myself, Carl Schutze, and J. L. Moore, to the honorable United States Senate.

Mr. Hoffman is only another martyr added to the long roll of the thousands of brave Southern Republicans who have been murdered by the Kuklux since President Hayes, in 1877, withdrew the Federal troops from the Southern States, thus placing Southern Republicans wholly in the power of the old rebel leaders, and the thousands of Kuklux assassins whom the rebel leaders controlled and directed in all their outrages, etc.

Since Mr. Cleveland's election in 1884, thousands of Kuklux outrages have been committed in many sections of the Southern States, where such outrages have never been hitherto known.

His re-election will make matters a thousand times worse than they now are in the Southern States. In event of his re-election tens of thousands of poverty-stricken colored people will pour into the Northern and Western States to escape Kuklux domination.

When will the liberty-loving and law-abiding people of the North realize that the Kuklux outrages of the South are perpetrated, not only to secure a solid and unbroken South, but also to secure the supremacy of the Southern leaders in the National Government?

Will the liberty-loving and law-abiding people of the North now unite to build up and maintain a solid and unbroken North, whereby the supremacy of law and good government may be maintained throughout every State in the Union, and which will protect every citizen in the full enjoyment of every political right guarantied by the Federal Constitution?

The election of Harrison and Morton will alone stop the retail and wholesale murders of Southern Republicans, and every citizen who fails or refuses to support them will largely aid to perpetuate the remorseless power of the Kuklux leaders of the solid South.

With sincere regards, I remain, yours truly,

S. A. HACKWORTH.

Hon. JOHN C. SPOONER,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I did not intend to have caused to be read the newspaper slips which are attached to that letter and which have been read, except that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] just handed to me the morning Post, which contains, pertinent to these extracts, the following:

GENERAL POLITICAL NEWS—TEXAS REPUBLICANS AFRAID TO MAKE A STATE CAMPAIGN.

GALVESTON, TEX., September 11.—The Republicans of Galveston County, in mass meeting last night, elected delegates to the State Republican convention, which meets at Fort Worth on September 20. Resolutions were passed condemning the occurrences in Fort Bend and Washington and appealing to the governor of the State to right matters. Another resolution was adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That the mob violence of Fort Bend County and the assassination of Joseph Hoffman, of Washington County, admonishes us that similar scenes may be expected to follow the vigorous efforts of our party in counties in which the Republican vote predominates; therefore it is the sense of this convention that the interest of the Republican party will be best served by not nominating a State ticket."

The letter of Mr. Hackworth abounds in pretty strong expressions, so strong, perhaps, as to warrant the charge of intemperance in his language, were it not for the fact that, as he states, he considers himself an exile by force, because of his political opinions, from the State of Texas.

I desire to read Hoffman's letter to Judge Hackworth, a private letter never intended for publication and doubtless, so far as it expresses his fears and the threats which had been made against him, absolutely true. I do not know how it may seem to others, but to me it is a pathetic letter, of a brave, strong man who dared in the face of danger to do his duty as he understood it and to maintain his allegiance to the party in whose principles he believed, even though it were in the presence of death. There are many things in it which, if it were not for the fact that he is dead, would perhaps be so irrelevant to anything involved here as to warrant the suggestion that I should omit them, but I will read the entire letter.

[Office of assessor of Washington County. Joe. Hoffman, assessor.]

BURTON, TEX., August 16, 1888.

DEAR STEVE: I received your letter yesterday, and I hasten to reply. I am glad you and your family are well, and I hope Mrs. Wallney and your mother are enjoying themselves in free Kansas, and if I can get a couple of weeks to spare as soon as I get money I will visit you. I have seen your scathing rebuke of Southern Democrats (K. K.) alluding to the troubles in your State, and I hope the murderers of Sheriff Cross—

I do not know what particular murder this is to which he refers. It was not one disclosed by the investigation—and I hope the murderers of Sheriff Cross and others will be dealt with according to law. I hope your prediction about Harrison is true, and then we will be all right with Paul for marshal.

That is Paul Fricke, as I understand it, a prominent Republican there.

We will make this country clean of murderers and ballot-box thieves, and, you can rest assured, I will do all I can to help get the position for Paul then. He is a noble, whole-souled fellow, and a truer Republican never trod the earth. Our ticket is made—

That is the combination ticket which Mr. Hackworth advised, as he states in his letter, should be put in the field, made up of Republicans and of men who, while Democrats, were opposed to the present Democratic régime in Washington County, which is a part of Mr. ROGER Q. MILLS'S Congressional district—and it is a good one; James E. Gray, county judge; Thomas J. Awalt, sheriff; C. Zurcher, collector; George W. Breedlove, treasurer; W. C. Broesche, county clerk; myself for same office—

That is, assessor, the office he held at the time—

Blunt for representative; W. H. Vinson, county attorney, but I heard he has withdrawn, and Press Simmons for district clerk, and he has withdrawn, and I do not know yet who will fill the vacancies. Our issue in the campaign is clear, and I am willing to do my part. I know it is dangerous, and I may be killed, but I will do my duty. I wish I could be somewhere during this campaign where I could do more good than here running for office. I would like to make some votes for the Republican nominees where it would count. You have no idea how well our ticket is taking; but whether the Democracy will succeed in getting their split-up ranks closed again I am unable to say. They lay all the blame to Paul and me, and I have been threatened a good deal lately. Dr. Watt remarked to Squire Broesche, in presence of his wife and daughter, if I persisted in running he would not answer for my life, and he would not stand back in shedding blood. I tell you, dear friend, the canvass will be red-hot, and I would rather be out of it, on account of my children, and my mother-in-law begs me day after day to have nothing to do with it; that should I be killed they will have no support. The old lady talks to me with tears in her eyes, but I have stood firm. God knows we miss you, Schutze, and Moore.

These are the two other signers of the petition upon which the investigation was ordered.

And while I know that Paul will not feel the interest in the campaign now that he would if he were on the ticket, I know he will do his duty and work and talk all he can, but he will not go to the meetings like he formerly did. George Brown wants me to go to the lower part of the county to the meetings, and I have expressed my fears to him about going and I have a presentiment if I go down there I will be killed. Dear Steve, you know I have not got the education I ought to have, but if the Republicans North can make use of me I would rather be there than here and I am coming to see you and I expect to live in free Kansas; then you know I can not live here and express my sentiments. Give my regards to your family, mother, and Mrs. Walling, and my best wishes to all of you.

Your friend,

JOE HOFFMAN.

He staid there; he accepted the position upon the ticket; he walked in the clear light of day, as he had a right to do, and he was shot down.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he has the envelope in which that letter was sent from Texas to Kansas?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir, I have.

Mr. COKE. Does it bear the postmark of Brenham?

Mr. SPOONER. On the upper left-hand corner is "Return to Joe Hoffman, county assessor, Burton, Texas." It bears the postmark "R. P. O.," meaning railway post-office, "Aug. 17, 1888." The rest of the postmark I can not decipher. It is addressed to "Mr. S. A. Hackworth, 206 East Fifth street, Topeka, Kansas." What is the object of the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. COKE. The object of my inquiry was to know whether the letter came from Joe Hoffman or not. I believe that letter, unless there is evidence of its having come from Texas, to be a forgery. I believe it to be a forgery. Mr. Hackworth, the writer of the letter which the Senator from Wisconsin has just read, is a man of infamous character. He is a man who ought not to be believed on his oath in any court of justice. He is a man who I believe would not hesitate to commit forgery or perjury or any other crime in order to make his point. For that reason I wanted to know if that letter appeared to have been mailed in Texas.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the assertion of the Senator from Texas as to the character or want of character of Mr. Hackworth, and his willingness to commit all the crimes known to man, would come to me with much more significance if it were not for the fact that at the time when the petition was presented to the Senate, signed by three men representing themselves to be citizens of the United States, and stating under oath that they had been driven by force and threats of death from their homes in Texas because of their political sentiments, stating in detail outrage after outrage, including the most cowardly murder, that had been perpetrated for purely political purposes in Washington County, Texas, stating that poll after poll at that election, all Republican, of course, had been raided by Democrats, and the ballots destroyed before they could be counted, and stating other facts upon which they based the demand that the Senate of the United States should hear their cry, the Senator from Texas arose in his seat and without hearing any of the testimony denounced these men as vagabonds and scalawags.

Mr. COKE. I did so, sir, because I knew them to be such before the testimony came here.

Mr. SPOONER. Since that time, charged with a duty by the Senate, I, in company with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], on this side, have examined the witnesses, have taken the testimony bearing on the charges so freely and so flippantly made by the Senator from Texas when this petition was introduced. And while I do not intend to debate at all the testimony taken before that committee, I have a right to say, and it is my duty to say in reply to what the Senator from Texas has stated, that his assertion that these men are without character is shown by the testimony to be utterly without foundation in my opinion.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Why, certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that is charged with the duty of making this investigation. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] and myself were members of the subcommittee appointed by the full committee to examine the witnesses brought before it upon the subject of this examination.

I was present during the time when most of the witnesses were examined, and so was the Senator from Louisiana, and so was the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. I feel it my duty to state, and I do state, that when that testimony is published it will fully verify the statement of the Senator from Texas that the man who wrote the letter that the Senator from Wisconsin has had read to the Senate is unworthy of credit and could not be sustained in any judicial proceeding by any reputable witness in the county and community in which he lived.

That examination was made months ago. It was protracted through several months. It culminated several months ago. I have never seen any of the testimony since it has been printed. It is all printed, as I am informed. There has been abundant time for that testimony to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Is not a copy of that testimony in the Senator's possession?

Mr. PUGH. I sent, at the instance of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], to the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a copy of that testimony. I obtained it and delivered it to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that the clerk of the committee——

Mr. PUGH. I have since sent for a copy of that testimony to the clerk to deliver to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I desired a copy of that testimony for my own use, having parted with the one sent me to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], as I stated before. I have never read that testimony in print. I have been unable to obtain any other copy of that testimony than the one I furnished to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. The clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was absent from the city a little while ago, owing to the very severe illness of his father, but the gentleman temporarily left in charge of the room during the clerk's absence, as I understand, delivered the last two copies, which had been printed for the use of the committee, to the Senator from Alabama, one for the senior Senator from Texas, and one for the junior Senator from Texas.

Mr. PUGH. I have never received but one copy.

Mr. HOAR. Then there is a mistake about it.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say that I called twice on different days on the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and asked him to furnish me a copy of the testimony he has been discussing, and I have called on two other members of the committee, and I have never been able to obtain a copy of the testimony.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I desire to state that the testimony taken by the subcommittee, which has never yet been reported to the full committee, will show that the troubles which that committee was called on to investigate grew out of an election of county officers. That testimony, in my opinion, will show beyond question that there was no politics that caused the trouble at Brenham after the election of those county officers. The contest in the election was over the election of a judge of probate and the election of other county officers. The candidates voted for at that election were nominated by a peoples' convention at Brenham, made up of citizens irrespective of party or race. That citizens' meeting nominated the candidates. That meeting was made up of colored people and white people, of Republicans and Democrats. The witnesses who testified before this committee were colored witnesses, Republicans, and white Democrats, and the witnesses who voted for the peoples' nominees in that election were a number of them Republicans in Washington County, men of property and men of character.

I state again that when that testimony is published it will fall far short of sustaining the statements made or the opinions expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin. There is a difference of opinion between that Senator and myself as to what that testimony establishes. I am perfectly confident that when that testimony is published and examined it will show that the troubles produced by that election and growing out of it were on account of an effort of the best citizens of Washington County, made up of Republicans and Democrats, colored people and white people, to keep the persons who were seeking these county offices from obtaining them, as they had had possession of them for years before; and one of them who had been county treasurer, I believe it was, had been convicted of embezzlement of many thousand dollars of county funds and lodged in the penitentiary. It was this class of people that had obtained these county offices through the use of the ignorant vote of the negroes. It was the use that they had made of these county offices that caused this meeting of the citizens for the purpose of defeating that class in holding on to these offices.

Mr. SPOONER. I only rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from Alabama to let me know when he gets through with his question.

Mr. PUGH. I obtained leave to make a statement, not to answer a question or ask one.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator took me off my feet in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. PUGH. I obtained leave to make a statement in answer to what the Senator himself stated, and if the Senator objects to my saying anything more——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. PUGH. Is there objection to my going on?

Mr. SPOONER. No, no. Let the Senator go ahead. I do not object at all.

Mr. PUGH. I will close by simply saying——

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PUGH. I say that I make the statements that I do upon personal knowledge of what the testimony will show when it is published, and I say that it will demonstrate to every fair-minded man that the statement made by the Senator from Winconsin has—I will not say no foundation—but the preponderance of the evidence taken by that committee that is worthy of credit and belief will show that his statement in reference to the facts it establishes is entirely unsupported.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Do the facts show that the ballot-box at Gr[illegible]all was raided while the votes were being counted and the ballots taken and the count stopped?

Mr. PUGH. I deny that the testimony will show that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the testimony show that there was any interference with the count at any poll in that county?

Mr. PUGH. I deny that the testimony will show that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the testimony show that there was ever any election in Washington County?

Mr. PUGH. Well, when the Senator asks a question that is worthy of an answer, and a proper one to be asked of a Senator or propounded by a Senator, I will answer it.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was so astounded by his answer to the two previous questions that I put to him, that I put what I concede was an improper question.

Mr. PUGH. I simply call on the Senate to wait until the testimony taken by that committee is published, and the Senate and the country can judge of the character of that testimony and what it establishes. I undertake to say that when it is published it will show that the troubles growing out of that election were provoked by the effort of these people, who are now getting up this investigation and trying to make political use of it. They occurred after an effort on the part of the best people in Brenham, Washington County, to displace these men from offices in which they had been guilty of embezzlement and crime, and in which they had destroyed the credit of that county.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. VEST. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to make a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1604) entitled "An act to change the time of the sessions of the circuit court of the western division of the western district of Missouri" having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

G. G. VEST,
JAMES F. WILSON,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
D. B. CULBERSON,
JNO. H. ROGERS,
L. B. CASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The report was concurred in.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed an act (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York; and an act (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased.

KILLING OF JOSEPH HOFFMAN, WASHINGTON COUNTY, TEXAS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the pending measure be informally laid aside in order that the Senator from Wisconsin may be at liberty to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside informally to permit the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to continue his remarks on the resolution submitted by him.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not mean to be put by the Senator from Alabama or by the Senator from Texas to the quite unnecessary task of defending the Committee on Privileges and Elections against the charge of having unnecessarily delayed making its report. That is not the business which at this particular moment I am engaged in. I ask the Senate to bear me witness that I have not engaged here in any debate upon the testimony given before that committee or the effect of it except so far as forced to do so by the intervention of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Alabama.

The Senator from Texas has challenged the authenticity of the letter which I read as passing from Mr. Hoffman to Mr. Hackworth upon the ground that Hackworth is a man of infamous character, ready at any time to commit the crime of forgery or any other crime which he thought would answer his purpose. I stated, and I repeat it, that the Senator from Texas, when this petition was presented to the Senate signed by S. A. Hackworth, by J. L. Moore, and Karl Schuetze, before any evidence had been taken, before the resolution or petition had even been referred to the committee, denounced these men in the same way as scalawags and not entitled to credit.

I said that the Senator's criticism or impeachment of these men did not come to me now with such significance as it would have come if after taking the testimony before the committee I had not been led to the conclusion that his original impeachment of their integrity and character was utterly without foundation. This has no bearing on the question I was debating except this, that it was in answer to his attack upon the genuineness of this letter predicated on the bad character not of the man who wrote it but of the man who sent it to me.

I said before the Senator from Alabama intervened, and I say again, that on the testimony taken before that committee, Stephen A. Hackworth, aside from the fact that he was a Republican politician, aside from the fact that he persisted in making Republican speeches to "nigger" audiences—which is proof positive in that region, as much of the testimony shows, that a man is a bad character—aside from the fact that he had been politically active, stands upon the testimony entitled to full credit on the witness stand and generally.

He had been for a long time a resident in that county. He had been repeatedly elected to office in the county. He had been once charged with an offense of some maladministration in office. Two or three indictments had been presented against him, or informations had been filed against him; and every witness by whom his character was sought to be impeached was asked the question, "Was he not indicted while he was county judge?" "Yes." But never in a single case was that question followed by the other question which would elicit the truth, that he was acquitted upon the trial, and the other charges were all nolle prossed.

There were men who testified before the committee generally that he was a bad man. On cross-examination, when we pressed them to know upon what they had based their impeachment of him, it turned out to be either that he could not pay his debts or that he made speeches to colored Republicans and was therefore an agitator! He could not pay his debts! I asked several witnesses the question whether there were any other men there who could not pay their debts. "Certainly." "Are there not Democrats there who can not pay their debts?" "Certainly." "Why do you not drive them away from Texas if that is sufficient ground for exile?" But analyzed and followed up, the adverse judgment upon Hackworth was palpably political. He is a great organizer, a bold, tireless Republican worker.

Another thing. How absurd it is that the Senator from Texas should attempt to discredit this letter—this statement from a man now dead—of his hopes and fears, and of his courage and devotion—this man who stood well even in Washington County, Texas, and who had been elected again and again to office, by such a suggestion.

Mr. COKE. What is the post-mark on the letter?

Mr. SPOONER. I care nothing about the post-mark on the letter. The envelope has printed on one end of it "Return in ten days to J. Hoffman, county assessor, Burton, Tex."

Mr. COKE. Where was the letter mailed?

Mr. SPOONER. It bears the stamp of the railway post-office, August 17, one day after its date. The letter is not from Kansas; the letter is not dated in Kansas. The letter bears date where it was signed or purports to be signed. It is on the official letter-head of Joe Hoffman, the assessor of Washington County:

Office of assessor of Washington County, Joe Hoffman, Burton, Tex., August 16, 1888.

Here is the official letter-head of Mr. Hoffman and the official envelope of Mr. Hoffman. The letter is signed by Mr. Hoffman, and is dated at Burton, Tex. There is every indication, to a right-thinking man, that this is a genuine letter. It carries proof of genuineness upon its face. There are two pages of it, not in the handwriting of Mr. Hackworth, but I believe in the handwriting of Mr. Hoffman; and the Senator asks that it shall all be discredited; that it shall be taken as a forgery; that that letter, as an appeal to the Germans of this country, from a German soldier who wanted to live and to be a free man in Washington County, Texas, shall be broken and shall go for nothing because the Senator states that Stephen A. Hackworth, who sent it to me, is a man of bad character.

Mr. President, another thing that goes to the weight of the Senator's condemnation is this: At the time he made his speech, when this petition was introduced, he denounced J. L. Moore, another of the petitioners, as a scallawag and a man unworthy of credit. Sir, I state without hesitation—and I believe I am entirely accurate about it—that among all the witnesses, Democrats and Republicans, who came before that committee, there were but one or two who did not say that Mr. Moore was a gentleman and entitled to credit, and that they had nothing against him except that he worked and voted for the Republican ticket, made speeches at negro meetings, etc. If I do not state the fact accurately, I hope the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from New York will correct me.

It will not do, Mr. President, to attempt to whistle this letter down the wind, to stifle this pathetic voice that comes up from Washington County to his countrymen, upon any such suggeston as that to which the Senator from Texas resorts.

The Senator from Alabama undertakes to discuss what I had not undertaken to discuss—the testimony given before that committee. I say, sir, that in my opinion the uncontradicted testimony shows that two separate ballot-boxes or polls were raided and that as to one of those cases the ballot-boxes while the count was going on were taken and the ballots taken out and the count not permitted to proceed. Upon one of these occasions a man who came in there named Bolton was shot dead.

I undertake to say that the undisputed testimony as to another of the cases is that after the ballots had been counted, and while two men, one of them an officer of the election, were on their way from the polling-place to the county seat to deliver over the papers to the proper county officer, they were stopped by masked men and at the point of a revolver were compelled to hand over their tally-sheets and the ballot-boxes. And yet the Senator would have it understood that there were no outrages committed on the ballot in Washington County, Texas!

Those polling-places were, as I need not say, all Republican polling-places. There was no violence at any Democratic polling-place. This was in the black district, where the Republican majority came from, and that was and had been for many years a strong Republican county. Three negroes who were at one of the polling-places were taken upon a charge of being accessory to the killing of this man Bolton—men who, I think the testimony showed, were absolutely guiltless of any participation whatever. They were never examined. No testimony was taken. They were taken out from the jail by masked men and hanged. They had no chance for their lives in this law-abiding county of Texas, any more chance than if they had been rats or mad dogs.

I stated the other day that there were circumstances connected with this infamous outrage pathetic beyond the power of expression. That was not all, sir. After the election, men—those men who have left the State of Texas and who signed this petition—had notices served upon them which are in the testimony, commanding them to leave the State of Texas. This was after a mass meeting of Democrats had been held at the county seat upon the subject. This man, Joe Hoffman, this brave man, who dared to be a Republican in Washington County, Texas, this man who had marched with Sherman, in our uniform and under our flag, from Atlanta to the sea, a German-American citizen, the uncontradicted testimony shows, when this election was over, had a notice served upon him. It is here in the testimony, and I would not for the world have commented upon this testimony, as I stated the other day, but for the fact that the Senators have compelled me, in justice to these men and in justice to the committee, to do it.

The testimony of the witness Hoffman was taken before the subcommittee, his examination being conducted by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], and I may say in reply to the Senator from Alabama that all the time that I attended the examination of these witnesses I never saw the Senator from Texas there for more than five minutes.

Let me read from the testimony which I hold in my hand—the notice to Hoffman:

DECEMBER 8, 1886.

JOE HOFFMAN:

You are requested to vacate Burton forever by Saturday night.

CITIZENS.

Mr. HAWLEY. The best people!

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the "best people"—"citizens." That is the old formula which obtained for so many years throughout the Southern States, when men were being driven to the swamp and out of the States because they chose to vote the Republican ticket. Mr. Hoffman was too brave a man to leave there, and he refused to leave, although his letter shows that he felt that he was in danger. He felt that his nine motherless children were liable to become orphans any day because of the malevolence of his political foes. Joseph Hoffman staid there like an honest man. This was no "nigger" killing; this was not some "negro agitator," whose existence there imperiled the best society. This was a white man, a Republican, living in the country of his adoption, which he had served in battle.

But, Mr. President, if any Senator on that side supposes that I introduced this resolution which I now send to the desk for the purpose of making the speech I am making, he is mistaken. If any Senator supposes I intended to debate what transpired before that committee, he is mistaken. If any Senator supposes that my desire was to stir up sectional strife or make a point for the Republican party, he is mistaken.

My purpose was this: This man, Joe Hoffman, was still under the subpœna of this Senate. This man, Joe Hoffman, had been served by an officer of the Senate with a subpœna commanding him to come here and give his testimony.

We may not be able, Mr. President, to throw the safeguard of the law, the protection which the law ought to give to all men whomever and whatever and wherever they are, around men in Washington County, Texas, if they choose to be Republicans——

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. We may not be able to throw the safeguards of the law around men in other parts of the South, but we ought to be able to protect a man summoned as a witness before a committee of the Senate. We ought to be able to protect him from being shot ruthlessly down at his home because he dared to obey a subpœna and give his testimony. If we can not protect him the fact should be known of all men.

Mr. PUGH. What information, let me ask the Senator, has he as to the circumstances under which Hoffman was killed?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no information as to the circumstances under which Mr. Hoffman was killed except this, that he had been before this committee, and we subpœnaed him as a witness again. He did not come. An officer of the Senate, who stands within hearing of my voice, who served the subpœna on him, informed the committee that Joseph Hoffman was afraid to come; that he had informed the officer that he had been threatened with death because of his former attendance and of the testimony he had given.

I have no other information than that, and the information given by this letter from Mr. Hoffman, that he lived in daily dread of what at last came to him.

I have, in addition, the information given by the newspapers, that he was shot in cold blood while talking with several gentlemen at Brenham, Tex., in broad daylight several days ago.

Now, Mr. President, the object of the resolution which I propose to offer is this: I want the Senate of the United States if they will, in view of the information which we have, which of course may not be absolutely accurate or entirely reliable, although I deem it sufficient to authorize and instruct its Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the circumstances attending the murder of this man, with especial reference to ascertaining and reporting whether the fact that he had testified before the Senate committee in obedience to a command of the Senate had anything to do with the cause of his taking off. That was the purpose of my resolution; that was the purpose with which I sought the floor and which I intended to express in five minutes instead of taking up the time I have taken.

Now, Mr. President, before I sit down I owe the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], I think, an apology (in view of the fact that he did not interrupt me orally) for alluding to him in the discussion. That apology I certainly tender to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. That is quite satisfactory to me, Mr. President. I had not interrupted the Senator at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I had interpreted the expression of the Senator's face as lawyers often do in court, and as I concede I probably ought not to have done in the Senate. I thought I saw something like a sneer on the Senator's face, but I owe him an apology for referring to it, which I cheerfully tender to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, I was simply enjoying a privilege which I think we all have on this floor, of smiling occasionally. I think it is a privilege we all exercise, the privilege of smiling, not of sneering. I do not think I was guilty of any offense. I was surprised when I was taken up by the Senator from Wisconsin. Of course I have no feeling about it at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I have made the amende honorable to the Senator as well as I can, and I think perhaps that feature of the debate ought to be ended.

I now send to the desk the resolution which I offer, and which I ask may be read for information and referred according to the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Joseph Hoffman, of Brenham, Washington County, Texas, a prominent German Republican of that county and a witness before the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, was recently shot down, apparently in cold blood, in said city of Brenham; and

Whereas there is some reason to believe that the taking of his life was directly attributable to his political views and activity and to the fact that he had given strong testimony before the Senate committee upon the investigation, which is still pending, under order of the Senate, into alleged election outrages perpetrated in said Washington County, Texas; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance that witnesses before Congressional investigating committees may, without danger to their lives, freely and fully testify concerning matters under investigation: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and it is hereby, instructed to investigate, either by the subcommittee in charge of the investigation of alleged outrages in Washington County, Texas, or by another subcommittee or otherwise, the circumstances attending the killing of said Joseph Hoffman, with especial reference to ascertaining whether said killing was in any sense due to the testimony given by said Hoffman before the Senate investigating committee as aforesaid, and the said committee, or its subcommittee as aforesaid, is hereby empowered, in pursuing said investigation, to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer; and said committee is directed to report at the earliest practicable day to the Senate, the testimony, with their views thereon, and such recommendation, if any, as to the committee shall seem best, and the said committee may sit during the recess.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I know nothing of the occurrence spoken of in that resolution except what I derive from the public journals, and I am informed by the dispatches in the papers I have received that Mr. Hoffman was killed by some unknown person, I think not in the day time but in the night; and at the same time that Mr. Hoffman was killed Mr. Holt, a leading Democrat of Washington County, and an exceedingly active one, was severely if not mortally wounded by the same shot.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Holt, I understand, has since died of his wound.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, Mr. Holt was bitterly opposing Judge Kirk and the present Democratic county ticket in Washington County.

Mr. TELLER. And was on the same ticket with Hoffman.

Mr. COKE. It was not stated that Holt was on the same ticket with Hoffman.

Mr. TELLER. He was supporting the same ticket; I will not say that he was on the same ticket.

Mr. COKE. My colleague tells me that Mr. Holt has died of his wound. I had not heard that. I am very sorry to hear it. He was a good man and a Democrat. He was the brother of Mr. Holt, the executive committeeman for the State of Texas in the national Democratic committee.

He and Mr. Hoffman were engaged in conversation together. Mr. Hoffman is said by the newspapers of Texas to have been the Democratic nominee for county treasurer, and he and Mr. Holt were together talking in front of a certain house when an assassin (it was after dark) fired upon them and killed Hoffman instantly, and, as my colleague informs me, Mr. Holt has died since. Am I correct?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think that I am mistaken. I think I saw a statement that Mr. Holt died a short time afterwards.

Mr. COKE. He was stated to have been severely if not mortally wounded.

Mr. SPOONER. It did not take him long to die; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. COKE. Now, Mr. President, here is a Democrat, a leading, active, working Democrat, who was shot down; and at the same time, and by the same assassin, Mr. Hoffman, also a Democrat, as reported in this paper, was shot. I do not know Mr. Hoffman, but he is represented in the dispatches to be the Democratic nominee for treasurer. Both were killed by the same shot. Yet this fact is paraded here by the Senator from Wisconsin with the view of showing that it was a Democratic outrage in Washington County.

Those are the facts as they are given in the newspapers of the country. Two Democrats were shot down by an unknown assassin when they were suspecting nothing, and yet it is called a great Democratic outrage!

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Texas, if he will allow me, whether he means to say that Joe Hoffman was a Democrat or had ever been a Democrat?

Mr. COKE. I mean to say this, that a newspaper at Brenham—that the Daily Dallas News, which has a dispatch giving a narration of the circumstances, says that Joe Hoffman was the Democratic nominee for county treasurer of Washington County, and only one of two nominees of the Democratic party that had not also been nominated or indorsed by the Republicans.

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator from Texas know that Mr. Hoffman had been a leading Republican?

Mr. COKE. I do not know it.

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator know that it was testified by more than one man before that committee that he was a Republican?

Mr. COKE. I did not know it at all, and I am led to believe that the Senator's understanding is not a correct one from the statements that I see in the papers and the only ones I see giving a statement of this transaction.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Texas has the printed testimony in which Mr. Hoffman testified that he was a Republican, and the Senator knows it, if he will take the pains to read it.

Mr. COKE. I have a volume of testimony as large as this volume that I hold in my hand. I have had it some two or three weeks, but I have only had time to glance hurriedly over an occasional page of it. I have not had time to go over the whole of it. I did not know that Mr. Hoffman had testified here until I heard it from the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Texas will allow me a moment, I will say that if the Senator holds that testimony in his hand and will turn to the index, he will find the name of Joe Hoffman among the witnesses; and if he will then turn to the page on which Joe Hoffman's testimony is given, he will see that he testifies under oath as to whether he is a Republican or a Democrat, and the Senator will not then repeat the statement that Joe Hoffman was a Democratic politician.

Mr. COKE. I remarked at the commencement that all I know about this transaction I derived from the newspapers; and I state what the newspapers say on this subject when I say that Mr. Hoffman was the Democratic nominee for county treasurer of Washington County; and I know Mr. Holt personally. I have known him for many years, and I know him to be a very strong, leading, and active Democrat.

And I know further, Mr. President, that nothing has occurred in Washington County in many years which has so excited the people as this double assassination. Meetings have been held there, and the governor has been called on to offer a reward of a thousand dollars for the discovery of this assassin. Private rewards have also been offered.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to say that I am glad that that is true. It denotes a change perhaps—I hope it does—in Texas.

The uncontradicted testimony showed that no rewards were offered for the apprehension of the men who raided the ballot-boxes or for the men who hanged the negroes in Washington County, Texas. I interrogated myself Governor Ireland on the witness-stand, and he testified that, although informed of the occurrence, he had offered no rewards, and the testimony showed that no step was taken either in the county or State to secure the punishment of the men that committed the crime.

Mr. COKE. It makes very little difference to me what the Senator's views are on a thing of this kind. I simply stated the fact that the governor had been requested to offer a reward for the discovery of the assassin, which is true.

Mr. EVARTS. For the discovery of this one.

Mr. COKE. And I cite that fact as evidence that it is not the case which is paraded before the Senate—of a Democratic outrage. The Senator from Wisconsin says that Governor Ireland offered no reward for the men who violated the ballot-boxes and who hung those three negroes. But a reward is offered for the men who assassinated those two men.

Mr. SPOONER. Then that must be because one of them was a Democrat.

Mr. COKE. Well, I am simply stating the facts. If they were Democrats then it is not the Democratic outrage that the Senator from Wisconsin would make it out to be.

Mr. SPOONER. I said one of them was a Democrat. I think the Democrat was killed by mistake, probably. I think the man they were after was a Republican, Joe Hoffman.

Mr. COKE. I simply state what I see in the papers about it. The papers said that Hoffman was a Democratic nominee for county treasurer. I know Mr. Holt to have been a Democrat, a very ardent and active one. Those are the two men who were killed.

With reference, now, to the facts that have transpired in Fort Bend County. The Senator from Wisconsin read papers showing that certain parties had been ordered out of that county.

What were the facts in that county? One of the very best citizens in that county, a Mr. Shamblin, was assassinated in his own house when surrounded by his wife and children, simply because he was a Democrat, and a card was tacked to his gate-post giving the reason for his assassination to be that he was a Democrat. Mr. Shamblin was a Democrat of Fort Bend County, sitting with his wife and children in his home and was shot down, and the transaction is explained by a card tacked to his gate-post. In a little while, may be two or three weeks, another attempt at assassination was made, another leading Democrat, Capt. H. H. Frost, was shot and badly wounded from an ambush as he was entering his own yard-gate at night. He was not killed, but that was not the fault of the would-be assassin.

From those transactions people became alarmed. When was this thing to cease? Who was to be the next? The people got together and having evidence that certain parties had instigated these assassinations they were ordered to leave.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to say that this, as a pretext for the ordering of this man to leave Washington County, Texas, was never lisped in all the investigation made before that committee, and I for one never heard it suggested until this moment.

Mr. COKE. I am speaking of the transactions occurring in Fort Bend County about which the Senator had some papers read some minutes ago.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was alluding to the other case.

Mr. COKE. That is all there is about the transaction in Fort Bend County. One Democrat was shot down when surrounded by his wife and children, and another severely if not mortally wounded two or three weeks after that as he was entering his house, both because they had been active Democratic politicians. It was in consequence of these things that the men were ordered to leave Fort Bend as described in the papers sent up by the Senator from Wisconsin to the desk.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Texas if that is all the punishment inflicted on people in Texas when they commit murder—that they are ordered to leave the State?

Mr. COKE. I do not pretend to justify these things. I simply tell what occurred.

Mr. TELLER. If these men are guilty, why are they not punished?

Mr. COKE. They ought to be punished, but you have cases all over this country of men who take the law into their own hands, and if there is anything that will make men do that, it is such assassinations as occurred in Fort Bend and Washington Counties.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Texas that I have had a pretty extended acquaintance in the United States, and I never knew in any section of the country where I have lived (and since I have been a voter I have lived in three States) a man killed for his political principles—never. Nor can the Senator state that any such killing occurred in any Northern State.

Mr. COKE. If I had known that this debate would occur to-day, I would have brought papers that I have on this subject. The debate has been precipitated upon the Senate without notice to anybody, and the papers referring to it are all in my room. But of the fact that these people were killed in Fort Bend County because of their politics, and that, too, as is supposed, by Republicans and negroes, there is no question in the world.

Mr. TELLER. Then you ought to punish them.

Mr. COKE. Well, these men were assassinated and their assassins are unknown. People get tired after awhile of being shot down in that way. One killed and then in a little while another wounded—intended to have been killed—and all from the same source.

Now, Mr. President, I do not desire to anticipate the Washington County case or the testimony in it. The testimony has not been laid on the desks of Senators. It is not here so that we can see it and comment on it and refer to it, but I do assert here now, notwithstanding the assertions made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the testimony taken by the Committee on Privileges and Elections utterly fails to make out any such case as he charges here before the Senate and the country against that people.

And I assert further, Mr. President, that of the three men who memorialized the Senate for this investigation, Hackworth and Schuetze are men of infamous character. I stated in reply to a question from the Senator from Wisconsin when this matter was up before, that probably Moore was a good man. I have since looked into the testimony. There are witneases who say that he is a good man, and there are other and better witnesses who say that he is a very bad man. As to Hackworth and Schuetze, I do not think anybody defends them against the charge of being very bad men.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator give me the name of the witness who says that he is an infamous man, or a very bad man?

Mr. COKE. Of whom does the Senator speak—Moore?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. COKE. Colonel Giddings for one. He says Moore is a bad man.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, who else?

Mr. COKE. I happen to remember that one. There were others—I will say as many as three or four witnesses—that testify that this man Moore is a bad man.

Mr. SPOONER. There were about forty witnesses examined, I think, and all the rest concurred that he was a good man.

Mr. COKE. However that may be, the testimony will be printed, the report will be made and will be laid upon the desks of Senators, and I am prepared when that is done to enter into a discussion of all of it, and have no fears but that an ample vindication of the people of Washington County will be the result.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have no disposition to continue this debate, but I feel it due to myself to make a correction of the statement I made in reference to the presence of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] during the examination of witnesses by the subcommittee. He, myself, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] were in frequent conference with the witnesses we had to examine, and I had confounded his presence on those occasions with his presence at the time of the examination of the subcommittee. He informs me himself that he was only present at the subcommittee examination on one day.

Mr. COKE. And then only for a few minutes.

Mr. PUGH. And then only for a short time. I desire further to state that the square issue between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and myself in reference to a matter of fact that each of us states is established by the testimony, is explained so far as I am concerned by the testimony as I remember it in reference to the raiding of the ballot-box. The testimony is that there was a young man by the name of Bolton, a young man of respectability and standing in the community—who was related, I believe to Judge Kirk or some of the candidates at that election——

Mr. COKE. His father was a candidate at the election.

Mr. PUGH. Yes, his father was a candidate for county commissioner. This young man went to the polling-place at Graball, as I believe the place is called, for the purpose of ascertaining the result at that box. The officers were engaged in counting the vote in an outhouse, and when he shoved open the door and entered the house where the election officers were engaged in counting the ballots, as soon as he appeared in the light, he was shot down in the doorway by some persons from the outside. My recollection is that there were as many as three shots fired at him from the outside of the building, and the young man fell dead in the doorway.

That produced such confusion and such a panic among the election officers that the lights were extinguished and the boxes and the ballots were scattered over the floor. They were never collected and were never counted.

The three negroes who were in jail and who were taken out and hanged, as has been stated, and as is shown by the testimony, were shown to have been present at the time this young man Bolton was shot, and it was believed that the three negroes were the authors of his death. They were arrested and put in jail on that charge, of the murder of young Bolton. When in jail some wicked people, if you call them so—of course it was wrong for them to go there and break open that jail, but it is done every day under provocations of that sort—entered the jail and took out the three negroes, and they were hanged.

That, Mr. President, I am satisfied, will be shown to be the fact as established by the testimony when it is published. Now, that is what is called the "raiding" which was established by the testimony. That occurrence was as I have stated.

The other facts in reference to the destruction of a return which the returning officers had to carry to Brenham or wherever the county seat was——.

Mr. TELLER. Brenham.

Mr. PUGH. Yes, Brenham—they were on their way to the county seat with the returns as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, and the ballots were taken from them and destroyed. I denied that that was a raid in the sense that I understood it, and I denied that the polling place at Graball was raided, because I say that the young man Bolton who went there did it for the innocent purpose of ascertaining what had been the result at that box, his father being a candidate for county commissioner, and as soon as he entered the building where the election officers were counting the ballots he was shot down at the door and was found there dead. These three negroes were arrested on the charge of his murder, and while in jail they were taken out and hanged by a mob.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas furthest from me [Mr. COKE] considers a newspaper as evidence that Mr. Hoffman was a Democrat. I believe that is the whole foundation and extent of the Senator's pretension that Hoffman was a Democrat. The pages of the testimony before the committee show that Hoffman was from top to bottom, from heart to action, a sturdy Republican under circumstances that required courage, heroism, and truthfulness, and not one word whatever has been made by way even of suggestion that he was anything but a Republican.

Let me read a dispatch from Brenham to the New York Herald, if the newspapers are sources of evidence as to the political opinions of important people:

BRENHAM, TEX., September 7, 1888.

Between 10 and 11 o'clock last night Messrs. Joseph Hoffman, tax assessor of Washington County, and James Holt, a prominent planter, were sitting at the corner of Murphy's saloon on the public square, engaged in conversation, when shot from a shotgun heavily loaded with buckshot entered the bodies of the two gentlemen, instantly killing Mr. Hoffman and fatally wounding Mr. Holt. The shot came out of the darkness, and nothing can be learned as to the identity of the assassin.

Mr. Hoffman was terribly wounded in a number of places.

A buckshot entered Mr. Holt's throat just beneath the chin and passed entirely through the neck.

As soon as the shot was heard a number of persons gathered on the spot, and their number was soon largely increased. Dr. Lockett was called and did what he could for Mr. Holt, but it is said he can not recover.

The cause of the shooting is a mystery. Hoffman was a Republican, and a candidate for re-election. He was one of the number proscribed during the political troubles in Brenham some time ago, which was made the subject of Congressional investigation. The Republicans here claim that Hoffman was the man shot at, and that the shooting of Holt was purely accidental.

The only testimony of hearsay—for these newspapers are hearsay—I read from the statement of Mr. Hackworth under his responsibility. After he had quoted and inserted the telegraphic communication which the Senator from Texas relies on as plenary proof, which led to that observation, he said:

The above statement—

That is, the printed telegram on which the Senator has relied—

The above statement that Mr. Hoffman was a Democratic nominee for county assessor is an unqualified falsehood. Some two months ago some of the leading "Kuklux" Democrats waited upon Mr. Hoffman and informed him if he would become a candidate for assessor upon the same ticket with Judge Kirk and other present Kuklux officials of Washington County, he would have no opposition, but if he became an opposition candidate he would be murdered.

He declined, as upon his own statement, to avoid a candidacy on what ticket? A ticket of the best men of Brenham and the best Democrats of Brenham. Among those espousing that ticket was Mr. Holt, whom the Senator from Texas vouches for as an excellent man and a prominent Democrat. I think he was both an excellent man and an eminent Democrat. He was supporting this ticket upon which almost all were Democrats, Joe Hoffman being a Republican, and two others retiring from the nomination because of threats of murder if they staid on the ticket. Mr. Holt, up to the time of his death, was on the side of Hoffman and on the side of the eminent and upright and courageous Democrats who were going to put down the dastardly crowd who committed the frauds and violence two years ago and were up again for re-election.

The assassin had two men in view of his murderous shot. One of them was a Republican obnoxious to the Kuklux, but not obnoxious to the honest and worthy Democrats of that country. With him was engaged this firm, courageous, excellent Democrat, who had espoused that same ticket and was on the side of Democratic and white Texan resistance against violence and murder.

A shot-gun fired at two people can not be treated as if it had the accuracy of the aim of a minie shot. There was either in that murder a purpose to take both lives, for they were both co-operating against the Kuklux ticket, or such recklessness in the purpose to drink the blood of the Republican that they did not care if it took down the Democrat who stood by his side. I talk of these things not affected by any dispute or any differences of opinion which occurred when these two gentlemen were conferring together. The shot came from a distance of 70 or 75 feet. There was no renconter, no excitement, but a deliberate murder in those streets, with none of the excuses of election excitement, or of any of the blood which, heated, excuses if it does not justify extravagances.

When we have from the letter of this murdered Republican a narrative, and the absolute verity and the nobility of his character are shown in every line, which ought to bring admiration from every honest Texan and from every honest Democrat, what do we hear from that State as here represented but a bold, rash proposition that that letter was forged by Hackworth? Look at it. Is there a man here who will look at that letter, without calling a witness to prove the handwriting of Joe Hoffman, and say that it was an invention? This has not come into existence since this murder. It has come into existence in a confidential, upright, clear communication from Joe Hoffman to Mr. Hackworth, exhibiting the situation of the contest, exhibiting the urgency of honest men, such as Mr. Holt and such as Mr. Hoffman, to do what they could in that region to assert the pre-eminence of justice and of right against violent men; and that was the issue.

Mr. Hoffman took his life in his hand when he was willing to stand as a candidate with Mr. Holt as a backer of the ticket, and all the honest Democrats who were on the ticket with Hoffman, he though a Republican and though exposed to every danger, which he realized and felt, that he stood in an attitude well warned by what preceded in the examinations before; and he was under the deep shadow of the recent death of his wife, with the nine children who were thus half orphaned clinging to his skirts to avoid a civil duty; and yet he fulfilled that duty.

I do not care what the Senator from Texas may say, nor what the Senator from Alabama may say, no man can read that letter and learn the fact of that man's murder without admiring the courage and the constancy of Hoffman, and believing in conformity with the whole record of his life and the whole record of the examination before the Senate committee, that he was an upright man, so known and felt by all Democrats and by all Republicans, by all black men and by all white men; that he fell under a former persecution; when there was an approaching election, by which that same set of men were to be re-elected who were engaged in the outrages before, and they were to be imposed upon a reluctant community—a community so reluctant that a great body of citizens of Democratic faith were on the ticket.

Hoffman had been elected for nine years assessor, the post of most confidence, as we all know, in judgment, in integrity, in confidence, and was chosen even in 1886 when he had been robbed of all these votes, because there was not fraud and violence enough to overcome the honest voters, black and white, of those precincts to re-elect Joe Hoffman. He was in office, and he was on the ticket to be re-elected. The Kuklux organization, of which Judge Kirk again was the leading candidate, was willing to make a barter, as we are assured, for the safety of his ticket, against the uprising resentments of the worthy Democrats of that county if he would take a place on it with the alternative, "Betray your Republican duty and you shall be continued in office; adhere to this uprising Democratic organization against us Kuklux and you shall be burned."

I agree that violence, however pitiable, however deplorable, is not to convict a community or a party. I use no epithets of accusation, but I know that it is as true in Texas as it was in Rome and is in all jurisprudence, si nocens absolvitur, judex damnatur. That is our accusation of Washington County and Washington County politicians, and the Kuklux violent men. I need not point a moral nor enforce an objurgation, for it is not my function to be a censor or a mentor; but when I heard the testimony given before us two years ago, I knew that if violence was to be the method of politics there, there would be no opportunity of drawing the line between the victims who were Republicans and the victims who were Democrats.

Is not this a pitiable occurrence? Is it not right that we should feel a spirit and a pride when we are told that at last the governor down there and the neighborhood are trying to find the author of this cowardly murder? When we hear of his being hanged after he has been tried and after he has been convicted, we shall not scruple to admire the deliberate justice in his case, although we contrast it with the rash act of that neighborhood, that without evidence and without one particle of fact in existence sacrificed the lives of these three colored men two years ago, as I think and shall be able to show to the Senate, upon no provocation and no incentive except that they spoke the truth and stopped vengeance that was intended to be visited upon those who had taken the life of Bolton.

The Senate, in anticipation of a principal inquiry, probed to the bottom the question whether this was an innocent young man who came to his death by mischance or by rash violence. This leader, Judge Kirk, at the stage of the election when it was evident that the people's ticket was to be elected, telegraphed to Bolton, who was the candidate: "Things look gloomy; put in your work." Young Bolton put in his work; and in disguise and armed entered this polling-place to put in work. There he stood, and one of the colored men going out and getting a gun came in and, with no complicity whatever of anybody else there, killed Bolton, who fell there before them, and lay for many hours before any of his friends dared to go there and claim him.

These matters are given in the evidence. Whenever we come to examine these questions, as we shall do, I promise the Senators that we shall then weigh the outside evidence that bears upon the motives and the excuses; but of the principal fact, that Bolton was slain red-handed in a violent plan and commenced execution against the ballot-box, there will be found no doubt whatever.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. EVARTS. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say that the testimony in possession of the Senator and his committee proves conclusively that young Bolton, who was murdered, went to see the state of the poll alone, and that just as he was going into the room where the vote was being counted was shot down by a negro with a gun and fell dead upon the floor. I mean to say that the testimony proves conclusively that Bolton had no comrade; that he was not armed; that he was not disguised; and that he went there when the vote was being counted to see how the poll stood, because his father was a candidate for one of the county offices.

Mr. EVARTS. Now——

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, I do not mean to say that that testimony is uncontradicted, because it is contradicted by some men who are not as credible as they might be. I do mean to say that the men, who at home where they live are believed on their oath, and in their words, and on their honor, testify to the facts as I state them.

Mr. EVARTS. I will agree that young Bolton came there alone, an emissary from his father, urged by the telegram from Kirk to him, "Things look dark; put in your work," or "get in your work." Judge Kirk, the writer of that telegram, through question after question and page almost after page, struggled to avoid the truth by every degree of prevarication in regard to that testimony, thinking that we could not get it. We proved it within all rules of evidence in the absence of the telegram itself, but when the criminal trial took place at Austin before the United States court the telegram was produced by the force of law, and it threw into absolute discredit all that Mr. Kirk and his friends could claim for it. The testimony was undisputed so far as ocular evidence went, that when the dead body as it lay, when his fearful comrades were afraid to approach it, was found the disguise was on it, the corpus delicti proving the deed and the guilt.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I shall not object to the passage of the resolution presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, simply because to object would seem that I was disposed to shrink from an investigation of the matters which he presents. But I do not wish it understood that in withholding an objection to that resolution I assent to the authority of Congress to investigate such a case. The Senator knows, as every Senator in this body knows, that Congress has no jurisdiction over such a case, notwithstanding the form in which he has put his words, as I understand it. The Senator tries to get jurisdiction by indicating that this man was possibly killed on account of testimony he gave here. That would not alter the case, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. SPOONER. The man was still under the subpœna of the Senate when he was killed.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall not continue the discussion on that point. Of course no presentation of facts or of law could arrest this sort of thing so long as the agitation of such a question and the misrepresentation of a people are necessary to influence an election.

If one should listen to the discussion here, to such speeches as have been made by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New York, without knowing the actual condition of things and the character of the people of Texas, he would be led to suppose that they were the most lawless, the vilest, and the most reckless on earth. Yet notwithstanding such speeches are made, men from New York every day are traveling through Texas, sometimes persons from Wisconsin, and there they find exactly the same sort of people that they find in all the other States, a people who abhor crime and who will punish it as inevitably as they obtain knowledge of guilt. Our courts punish crime without reference to race or condition or politics. So far as I am concerned, whenever a man violates the law, whether by committing murder, by unlawful interference with the ballot-box, or by any other unlawful act, I would aid in and insist upon his punishment.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of this question generally. I only want once more to call attention to the fact that has come out to-day from the gentlemen who know and members of the committee, that the evidence in this Washington County case was taken and finished four months ago, and that it has lain in the hands of the committee and in the hands of the Senator from Wisconsin, who is chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I said at the outset—the Senator probably did not hear me—that I am not the chairman of the subcommittee. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is the chairman.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator may not be the chairman, but he understands about it; and he has certainly taken the lead in representing the committee on this floor. Perhaps on that account I was misled, for I had understood that he was chairman of the subcommittee.

That testimony being in his hands for four months or in the hands of the committee four months, if not in his, two elaborate discussions are made here, ex parte, one-sided, prejudiced, unjust to the last degree, in order to do what? Not to secure justice, not to secure fairness in elections, not to arrest murderers and prevent murders, but in my judgment solely for the purpose of agitation and of aggravating public sentiment and securing strength in the pending election.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator from Texas read the testimony taken before the committee?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not read the testimony taken before the committee. I have read what was taken in the United States court and a supplement that goes with it, but I have not read the body of the testimony.

Mr. SPOONER. I have based the remarks I have made on this subject upon the testimony taken, and I was curious to know how the Senator from Texas could find it comporting with fair criticism to denounce statements made upon that testimony as unjust and prejudiced when he himself has never read a line of it.

Mr. REAGAN. I did read, as I told the Senator, such testimony as was taken before the United States court at Austin, which is a considerable pamphlet, and a large pamphlet of the testimony taken before this committee in reference to the testimony at Austin, but the other I have not read. The testimony which I read deals largely with the very facts which these two gentlemen have been discussing, so that I am not entirely in the dark.

But, Mr. President, it is a curious spectacle to see a distinguished Senator, two distinguished Senators, come twice before the Senate with the testimony in their hands, unwilling or afraid to produce it, and make deliberate and elaborate efforts to prejudice the popular mind against the people of Texas. It is a spectacle I imagine that has never before been witnessed in the Senate, a committee charged with an investigation coming twice before the Senate to discuss the testimony and holding it in secret, either unwilling or afraid to publish it so the Senate can see and verify the truth of the statements submitted and see the kind of testimony and the character of the men who delivered it.

The Senator from New York chose to say that my colleague relied upon a newspaper statement as to the facts he presented, and the inference was that the paper published in the county where these transactions occurred was unreliable—testimony published in a daily at Fort Worth by a man of character, and testimony published in a daily paper at Houston, Tex. All these papers give the same account, that Hoffman was the nominee of the Democrats for assessor of taxes in Washington County.

My colleague has stated that he knew personally Mr. Holt as a leading man, as a brother to the superintendent of the Central Railroad, who is also a member of the executive Democratic committee of the State of Texas, a man of high character and a decided Democrat. But the Senator from New York in the face of that statement assumes that Holt was co-operating with Hoffman against what he was pleased to term, without a word of evidence, the Kuklux organization of Washington County. I say without a word of evidence so far as the Senate knows, for no such thing has been revealed in the testimony. These gentlemen are not only misrepresenting, in my opinion, the facts, but to some extent they are making witnesses of themselves.

The Senator from New York, after expressing disbelief in what my colleague had said, goes on to offer as testimony a dispatch to the New York Herald, which upon its face bears the evidence that it is a partisan dispatch, because it goes on to recite things known to be untrue. I want to say this, and I will say it though my colleague is present: He has told you upon his authority that Hackworth is an infamous man. My colleague has served his State as judge of the supreme court; he has twice served the State as governor; he has nearly completed his second term in the United States Senate, and yet the Senator from New York chooses to take the authority of a man he does not know and assumes that it is better authority than a statement made by my colleague upon his own personal knowledge. So you see the extent to which matters are to be carried in order to warp judgment and incite prejudice and influence elections.

The Senator assumes that Holt was shot by accident in the attempt to kill Hoffman. How does the Senator get that information?

Mr. EVARTS. I have not said that. I read it from a newspaper.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator read it from the New York Herald dispatch.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes. I have not said that.

Mr. REAGAN. That dispatch states no fact indicating the truth of it. Is it not as possible that Hoffman was killed in an attempt to murder Holt as that Holt was killed in an attempt to murder Hoffman? The two gentlemen were acting together politically at the time, whatever their antecedents may have been. They were standing together late in the evening, and were shot at a distance of some 25 yards. Is it to be presumed that a man actuated simply by political prejudice and partisanship would sacrifice a leading political friend in order to shoot down what Senators claim to be a political enemy?

These Senators are both distinguished lawyers, they are both familiar with the rules of evidence. I take it that neither of them would permit such evidence in a court of justice either to form an opinion or to influence an opinion of a jury. It is an assumption based upon prejudice, unwarranted by the facts, and it seems to me it ought not to have been stated.

The Senator from New York states that Holt was obnoxious to the Democrats on account of the part he was taking. The dispatch which the Senator referred to, if I remember aright, does not state that, and he did not have the authority of that dispatch for the statement, I believe. Where he got his information that Holt was obnoxious to the Democracy of Washington County I do not know. The Senator may explain if he chooses.

Mr. COKE. I will state to my colleague that there is not in Washington County a more thorough-going, active, or live Democrat than Mr. Holt who was assassinated.

Mr. REAGAN. So I have understood, though I had no personal acquaintance with him.

Mr. EVARTS. And I believe I paid him every compliment that I could furnish him, but that did not stand in the way of his being shot.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator is very kind to compliment a man whom he puts in a false position in that way. I compliment people upon whom I desire to confer compliments in a very different way. I do not first place them in a false position and then compliment them for being in a false position, as the Senator has done.

Mr. EVARTS. I thought I understood the Senator to say that he believed Holt was sympathizing with the ticket on which Hoffman was.

Mr. REAGAN. On the contrary, I said exactly the opposite. The Senator misunderstood me, if he supposes I said Holt sympathized with the enemies of Democracy.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator's colleague is right in his assertion often repeated here, that Hoffman was on the Democratic ticket, of course Holt, being a loyal, staunch, fearless, splendid Democrat, must have sympathized with Hoffman.

Mr. REAGAN. The fact that these two men were murdered together, one a known active Democrat and the other the nominee of a Democratic convention, does not carry out the theory of these gentlemen that it was a Democratic political murder, and it may turn out that it was a Republican political murder. The Senator from New York smiles; and yet within the last ten days or two weeks one of the best men in Fort Bend County, as has been stated by my colleague, an active Democrat, was called to his door in the night time and shot down for being a Democrat. A statement was found pinned to his gate showing the reason for his being shot down, and the newspapers show that the evening before this occurred a prominent negro politician had threatened to take his life. Yet the Senators have no sympathy for that man and for his bereaved widow and orphaned children. Soon after, another citizen of that county, an upright and an honest man, was in like circumstances attempted to be assassinated. He was severely wounded, and the last statement I saw was that he was restless and his wounds are considered very dangerous; he may be dead now.

They were shot down under circumstances which made the people believe, by negro politicians, because they were Democrats; but these two Senators propose no investigation as to the murder of Democrats by negro politicians. They have no sympathy with them or with their families. They have no anxiety about the failure of justice. That is all right; they were nothing but white men and Democrats; no matter if they were murdered.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will allow me to proceed for a moment. While I am on this feature of the discussion, I desire to call attention for a moment to the denunciation which the Senator from Wisconsin made on the floor some weeks back of the mob which hung the three negroes in Washington County. He went on in the same speech, as you will see if you will look at the RECORD, and spoke approvingly of the murder of Bolton. He said he ought to have been murdered. Why? He was a white man and a Democrat and ought to have been murdered—a Senator of the United States, on the floor of the Senate in a public address, justifying murder because it was the murder of a white man and a Democrat! Now I will hear the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Wisconsin did say that.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Texas need have no anxiety about the necessity of calling witnesses or corroborative statements to establish the accuracy of the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin, because whatever I say upon the floor of the Senate I intend to avow. I stated that this man, Bolton, was engaged at the time he was killed in a raid upon the ballot-box, and I stated, and it will be found in the RECORD, that being so engaged in a raid upon the ballot-box with confrères and associates he deserved to be shot down.

Mr. REAGAN. And ought to have been shot down?

Mr. SPOONER. What is the difference between saying that a man deserves to be shot down and saying that he ought to be shot down? I undertake to say, while I am upon the floor, that whether the election officer be a white man or a colored man, if a band of ruffians invade the polling-place and attempt to take by force the ballot-box, to defeat the count of the ballot, the officers there charged with the custody of the polls, in the exercise of a sworn duty, if they have the means at hand with which to defend the polls, ought to defend them even to the extent of killing the marauders. I say that that night when these two election officers were traveling to the county-seat, engaged in a duty imposed upon them by law, to carry the ballot-box and the tally-lists, to be delivered to the proper officers of the county, and those Democratic marauders stopped them and compelled them at the point of a revolver to deliver over those ballots and the tally-list—if they had been armed and had been brave and faithful men they would have shot them and retained possession of the ballot-box and the ballots and would have gone on in the discharge of their duty. I said just what the Senator claims I said, and I meant what I said, and I avow it now. I did not call it murder; I should call it justifiable killing.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator has heard nearly all the testimony and he is either afraid or unwilling to submit it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that is an unjust aspersion upon me.

Mr. REAGAN. Why does the Senator not submit it, then?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has stated over and over again, and I have assumed he intended to be fair, that I am chairman of the subcommittee charged with the duty of making the report of this testimony to the Senate, and I have informed him again and again that I am not. It is no more my function nor my right to make the report than it is the Senator's. The Senator says a good deal about not having this testimony.

When the debate on the Texas investigation came up casually some weeks ago it was brought on by the Senator's colleague, and the Senator's colleague has had for a long time in his possession all of the testimony taken by this committee. I presume if the Senator now speaking were extremely anxious to read it he could borrow it of his colleague. I endeavored to obtain it for the Senator from Texas, but the supply was exhausted. It had only been printed for the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Exhausted for campaign purposes?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina says it was exhausted for campaign purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. I expect it was.

Mr. SPOONER. The testimony had only been printed for the use of the committee, and no copy was sent out to the public at all, as I understand it. It was given to the Senator from Texas because he represented the State and was interested in it. I know of no other Senator than the Senator from Texas who had a copy.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope I may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. COKE. I will state that the copy I received was given me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. SPOONER. He is a member of the committee. I endeavored to get a copy for the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. REAGAN. While a portion of the testimony has never been accessible to me, that portion of it taken before the United States court at Austin has been in my possession, and a portion of the testimony taken here has been in my possession. So far as that testimony is concerned, the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin is not borne out that Mr. Bolton went to interfere with the ballot-box. On the contrary, the testimony states that Bolton was a young man of exceptionally good character; that about 10 o'clock at night, I believe it was, while the vote was being counted, he went to the election precinct and started to go into the room where the vote was being counted, and as he entered the door he was shot down and fell upon the floor.

Mr. HOAR. How was he dressed?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not going to leave anything out, the Senator will find before I am done. He was dressed as an ordinary citizen, with a rain-coat on, and nothing else. He was alone and unarmed. Can it be supposed that a man alone and unarmed had gone there to rob the ballot-box in the presence of all the people who were there? Is it possible? I have seen no testimony but what shows he was alone.

Gentlemen make reference to the cowardly part of the citizens of that neighborhood and the friends of this young man in not going to his relief. He had been assassinated, and there were three negroes armed with guns on the porch from whence the fire came that killed him. It is possible that good citizens were afraid to go there until daylight, lest they should be shot down in like manner.

When found in the morning some sort of a cloth was spread over his face. The witnesses were cross-examined as to whether it was tied there. All who spoke of it said it was not, but that it had been laid loosely over his face. That is the basis, and the only basis, that these Senators have for saying he was disguised, so far as I know and so far as the testimony taken by this committee or the testimony taken at the district court at Austin shows. Could this man have spread the handkerchief over his own face after being shot dead?

Mr. SPOONER. I am willing to admit that he could not.

Mr. REAGAN. If he had been disguised, would not that disguise have been in some way fastened around his neck or face or head? But every witness whose testimony I saw upon that point testifies that it was a loose handkerchief or cloth spread upon his face.

That is the ground upon which Senators assume that he was disguised; but the very fact that that young man, with the character he bore within the knowledge of all his neighbors, went there alone and unarmed to inquire about the result of the election, as is supposed, and was shot down, is enough evidence of the falsity of the statement that he went there to raid the ballot-box.

I do not know whether the Senator from New York did it by design; it may have been an inadvertence, but his remarks left the impression that the man who was the candidate for county judge had telegraphed to this Bolton "Things look gloomy; do your work," and that Bolton had gone there to do his work by raiding the ballot-box. The testimony shows that no such dispatch nor any other dispatch was sent to this man.

Mr. EVARTS. I did not say it was. I knew perfectly well what the facts were, and I stated them. The Bolton who was on the ticket was the father.

Mr. REAGAN. I may have misunderstood the Senator, but I state it the way I understood it and the way it impressed my mind, that the idea was to go out to strengthen this case that young Bolton had been dispatched, and that he had gone to perform the work of raiding the ballot-box, and was shot down for doing so. He was a young man unarmed. Every witness states that he was unarmed.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator means every witness he has read?

Mr. REAGAN. Every one I have read, and I read all the testimony before the court, and I read a large pamphlet of the testimony that was taken before the committee. There may be other testimony, but I speak of the testimony of the people who were there on the ground, the testimony given on oath before a court.

Mr. President, the American people as a rule have been distinguished for their law-abiding character and for their disposition to uphold and sustain not only the law, but the action of courts in administering it. I do not think the people of Texas are an exception to this rule, and if either of those Senators should ever honor the State by passing through it, I am sure they never would again make such speeches as they have made upon this floor. There are troubles brought on the people there not by their fault, but brought on them by the logic of events that they could not control, by placing two dissimilar races with race prejudices on the same level as to political rights.

If the facts existed in New York or in Wisconsin as they exist in Texas and other Southern States, I imagine the feelings of these gentlemen would be very different from what they are. I do not mean to state that as justifying violence of any kind or wrong of any kind. I have no doubt there have been in the Southern States instances of violence and instances of wrong growing out of race prejudices and growing out of the bad conduct of one or the other, and sometimes, possibly, of both.

Mr. President, we are not to judge the people by exceptional circumstances like this. You can scarcely pick up a newspaper that does not tell you of some man in the Northern States, where they are not confronted with such trouble as this, a man who has murdered his wife, or a wife who has murdered her husband, some parent who has murdered a child, and some deaths by poison, or other violent means. Are we to judge of the people of that section of the country by these characters? Is that the evidence upon which we are to test the character of their civilization? I do not assume it, because I know it would be a false ground. I understand how strong the purpose is among the people there when such crimes are committed to bring the offenders to justice. There is no reason for picking out exceptional cases and judging whole States by individual instances or neighborhood troubles, as these Senators propose to do.

Attention might be called to one fact, and it will, if gentlemen feel like having it, perhaps have something to do with their conclusions. The negroes are scattered over almost all the State of Texas. No one has ever heard of a negro's rights being interfered with in a county where there were not negro majorities; and there now, and from now until the election, Republican speakers of all sorts and rank make their speeches with the same freedom and fullness of discussion, and as I am sorry to say engage in about the same sort of denunciation on both sides that they do elsewhere during the campaign, and no disturbance follows such discussion. The freedom of discussion is as perfect there as it is anywhere on earth, and I state upon my veracity as a man, from a very extensive knowledge of the people—and I have heard the orators often—I have heard them make statements like these Senators make, and I have heard them do more; I have heard them abuse, traduce, and slander the very people among whom they lived, and yet the people laugh at their ignorance and malice and nobody disturbs them. But where they get the majority in some cases they have become overbearing, insulting, offensive, and this has led to retaliatory action. I am sorry that it should ever be so.

Gentlemen will understand that this is a great race problem which we are trying to solve. In the State in which I live the negroes are not only as thoroughly protected by law in the freedom of speech and the right of property and defense in the courts as the white people, but the State makes the same ample, generous provision for their education that it does for the white people, no more and no less. In addition to giving them the benefit of ordinary common schools it has provided at State expense a normal school for the education of teachers for them. It has given them a place in the State Agricultural and Mechanical College. It has given them a place in the University where they can take the degrees of the University without charge or expense.

That State has done all this for the negroes. Its people feel the importance of elevating them into good citizenship, into a knowledge of the functions and duties of citizens. The State has done all that it could do to promote their welfare, and let people feel as they may about the race problem, they are doing all they can to elevate these people in the scale of citizenship, so that by intelligence and by virtue race prejudice and race collisions may not mar the harmony of society.

These are the kind of problems we are to deal with. Gentlemen may think no sort of feeling should be manifested in the presence of such discussion and such circumstances so variant from the truth as the general tone of them is; but if they could turn the matter around and take to themselves the condition in which we are, and find our people persecuting them for every crime with which a black man was connected for political effect and purposes, they could then realize the sort of feelings which we have and must have when we see our misfortunes brought about not by our action but entailed upon us by the logic of events, and instead of giving us their sympathy and giving us their encouragement and aiding us to punish crime and to protect the virtuous and innocent, they seize upon our misfortunes to aggravate public sentiment, to excite sectional prejudice as a means of controlling political elections.

This is hard for an American citizen, hard for a whole State of American citizens to bear, but I suppose there is to be no help for it. Now, nearly a quarter of a century after the close of the trouble which led to the present condition of things, we are to be treated, every time there is a violation of law, whether within Federal jurisdiction or not, with an investigation. Why do not gentlemen investigate the murders of Chinese over in Montana? Why do they not investigate the murders and riots in Cincinnati? Are they a different people? Are they more capable of self-government? We must all understand, when it is assumed that the people of a State can no longer enforce the laws preserving the rights of life, liberty, and property, that that people have ceased to be capable of self-government; and wherever an assertion of Federal jurisdiction over a State, where it has no authority, is made, it is the assertion of the paternal power of the Federal Government and of the fact that the people of that State are no longer capable of self-government, but must be governed by a power outside of themselves and superior to themselves; and whenever this assumption shall culminate into action our republican system, our dual system of government, our local self-government will have passed away, and the despotism of majorities will have been inaugurated, and then the end of the Republic must inevitably come.

I do not wish to see these things. If gentlemen will entrust these things to the people of the States where they occur, they will find that the people—I speak especially of the people of Texas—will try to enforce the law. These gentlemen assume that a reward has been offered for the murderer of Holt and of Hoffman because one of them was a Democrat. Whenever it comes to sectional prejudice or denunciation, these gentlemen seem to forget logic and reason. If they find the man who killed Holt they also find the man who killed Hoffman. If it was a political murder would those people who sympathized with the murderers offer a reward for the arrest of the assassin who murdered these two citizens?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to interrupt him, for I do not wish to detain the Senate by any general speech on this subject further?

Mr. REAGAN. I am nearly through, but if there is any necessity for a question or a correction, I will yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I only wish to say to the Senator in explanation of that remark, that it was because Governor Ireland, of Texas, when he was before the investigating committee, was interrogated as to whether the fact that these three negro Republicans had been hanged had been brought to his notice, and he testified that it had. He was asked whether he had offered any reward for the apprehension of the murderers, and he testified that he had not. There was also brought to his attention the fact of the outrages committed at the polls in Washington County, and being interrogated as to whether he had offered any reward for the apprehension of those who had perpetrated those outrages he testified that he had not. I simply stated that if a reward had been offered in this case, I was rejoiced at the change that had come over the spirit of affairs in Texas, and I feared the reason was that one of the men who had been killed was alleged to have been a Democrat.

Mr. REAGAN. Without having the testimony before me, I am unable to go into a discussion of matters which are perhaps more within the knowledge of the Senator than mine. There may have been circumstances influencing the action of the governor which left him without fault.

The Senator does not inform the Senate that in that contest there was a Republican ticket and a People's ticket, and that that People's ticket was made up of Democrats and Republicans, and the candidate upon that ticket for the Legislature was a black man and a Republican, and he was one of the witnesses before the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. One ticket, called the People's ticket, was made up of Democrats and Republicans who were acting with the Democratic party, or Mugwump Republicans, and the other was a straight-out Republican ticket.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps the Senator knows better than the witnesses, and better than I do. The people there had felt the pressure of these race troubles, they had seen the robbery of their county by reckless officials, and they banded together, Republicans and Democrats, to protect the county and give it good officers. That is the truth about it.

Mr. SPOONER. The testimony before the committee shows that during all the years the Republican party had been in control in that county, county orders had gone from almost nothing until they were at nearly par.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator forgets that my colleague stated that the collector there was sent to the penitentiary for robbing the county of some thousands of dollars. It does not suit the Senator to remember facts like that, and there are other counties in Texas in which some of the officials were so notoriously corrupt that the citizens combined, as they have for three or four elections in Harrison County, where there is a large Republican majority, for the purpose of putting a People's ticket forward and electing honest county officers, but reserving each to himself the right to vote with his party for State officers and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, it is true that the testimony shows that during all of the years of Republican administration in that county but one of the county officers, I think the treasurer, had been guilty of a defalcation, but it shows nothing else in the way of maladministration or malfeasance during all those years, and I submit to the Senator——

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. One moment. I submit to the Senator that that is not sufficient foundation for characterizing, as he does, the entire Republican administration of that county during all those years as corrupt, any more than the fact that the Democratic treasurer of the State of Kentucky not long ago was found to have stolen several hundred thousand dollars would warrant me in denouncing in general terms, as he has done several times, the Democratic administration during all the years it has been in power in Kentucky.

Mr. REAGAN. I was proceeding to say that there was this much of justice in the criticism the Senator makes on my observations. I ought to have stated perhaps that I did not make that statement upon positive knowledge as to the facts of the action of these county officials; but I did speak from a general knowledge of the facts which are of general notoriety with reference to a number of counties, and I would rather that my remarks should be understood as being limited in that way than to be understood as submitting any general assumption of the corruption of the officers of Washington County, for about that I do not know any more than the others; but I do know that in some of the counties the blacks have been acting with the whites to elect people's tickets in order to protect them and secure good officers, reserving to themselves the right to vote with their party on the State and Congressional tickets.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I wished to and with less profit than I could have desired, because this debate has been sprung up in a way not to give an opportunity for its fair consideration; and I regret that for a second time it should have been obtruded upon the Senate when the testimony is withheld so that Senators can not form a fair judgment or discuss the question involved intelligently.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, on account of an allusion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I feel it incumbent on me to offer a very few words in the way of improvement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow we to have a message read, which has been received from the President, so that an order to print it may be made?

Mr. BLAIR. I yield for that purpose.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

Responding to the inquiries contained in the subjoined resolution of the Senate of the 28th ultimo, I have the honor to state in reply to the subject first therein mentioned, calling upon the Executive for "copies of all communications, if any, addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating with that Government against the wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens by the action of the Canadian Government in refunding to vessels and cargoes which pass through the Welland and other Canadian canals nearly the entire tolls if they are destined to Canadian ports, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage; and the breach of the engagement contained in the treaty of 1871, whereby Great Britain promised to the United States equality in the matter of such canal transportation; also copies of any demand made by his direction upon Great Britain for the redress of such wrongs, and the replies of Great Britain to such communication and demand," that I herewith transmit copies of all communications between the Department of State and the United States consul at Ottawa, which are accompanied by copies of the orders of the Canadian officials in relation to the subject inquired of. Also correspondence between the Department of State and the British minister at this capital, with copies of the documents therein referred to.

I also inclose, as connected therewith, a copy of executive document (No. 406, House of Representatives, Fiftieth Congress, first session) containing the answer of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 23, 1888, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives relating to the navigation of the Welland Canal; and the documents thus transmitted comprise the entire correspondence in relation to the subjects referred to in that portion of the resolution of inquiry which is above quoted.

The second branch of inquiry is in the words following:

"And also that there be communicated to the Senate copies of all papers, correspondence, and information touching the matter of the refusal of the British Government, or that of any of her North American dominions, to allow the entry at Dominion seaports of American fish, or other cargoes, for transportation in bond to the United States since the 1st day of July, 1885."

It will be remembered that though the fishing articles of the treaty of 1871 expired on the said 1st day of July, 1885, a temporary arrangement was made whereby the privileges accorded to our fishermen under said articles were continued during the remainder of that year's fishing season.

No instance of refusal by the Canadian authorities since July 1, 1885, up to the present time, to allow the entry at Dominion seaports of American cargoes other than fish for transportation in bond across the territory of Canada to the United States has been made known to the Department of State.

The case of the fishing steamer Novelty, involving, among other things, a refusal, on July 1, 1886, of the right to permit the transshipment of fish in bond at the port of Pictou, Nova Scotia, was duly communicated to Congress in my message of December 8, 1886, a copy of which I herewith transmit. (Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, page 1.)

On page 16 of this document will be found a copy of a communication addressed by the Secretary of State to the British minister, dated June 14, 1886, on the subject of the refusal of transshipment of fish in bond. At page 24 of the same publication will be found the protest of the Secretary of State in the case of the Novelty, and at pages 49–50 are the response of the British minster and report of the Canadian privy council.

On the 26th of January, 1887, a revised list of cases of alleged ill-treatment of our fishing vessels in Canadian waters was furnished by the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, in which the above case is included, a copy of which, being Senate Executive Document No. 55, of the second session Forty-ninth Congress, is herewith inclosed; and in the report by Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations (No. 1683 of the same session), the case referred to was again published. And, as relating to the subject of the resolution now before me, the following pertinent passage, taken from the said report, may be of interest:

"As regards commercial and other friendly business intercourse between ports and places in the Dominion and the United States, it is of course of much importance that regulations affecting the same should be mutually reasonable and fairly administered. If an American vessel should happen to have caught a cargo of fish at sea a hundred miles distant from some Canadian port, from which there is railway communication to the United States, and should be denied the privilege of landing and shipping its cargo therefrom to the United States, as the Canadians do, it would be of course a serious disadvantage, and there is, it is thought, nothing in the treaty of 1818 which would warrant such an exclusion. But the Dominion laws may make such a distinction, and it is understood that in fact the privilege of so shipping fish from American vessels has been refused during the last year."

I also respectfully refer to Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 54, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, being a communication from the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, dated February 5, 1887, which is accompanied by a partial list of vessels injuriously treated by the Canadian authorities, based upon information furnished to the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

This list is stated to be supplementary to the revised list which had been transmitted to the committee by the Secretary of State January 26, 1887.

Of the sixty-eight vessels comprised in this list it is stated that six, to wit, the Nellie M. Snow, Andrew Burnham, Harry G. French, Col. J. H. French, W. H. Wellington, and Ralph Hodgdon, were refused permission to transship fish. None of these cases, however, were ever reported to the Department of State by the parties interested, or were accompanied by affidavit; nor does it appear the facts ever were investigated in any of the cases by the parties making the reports, which were obtained by circulars issued by order of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The concluding inquiry is as follows:

"And also that he communicate to the Senate what instances have occurred since the 3d of March, 1887, of wrongs to American fishing vessels, or other American vessels, in the ports or waters of British North America, and what steps, if any, have been taken in respect thereto."

Soon after the passage of the act of March 3, 1887, the negotiation which had been proceeding for several months previously, progressed actively; and the proposed conference and the presence at this capital of the plenipotentiaries of the two governments, out of which the since rejected treaty of February 7, 1888, eventuated, had their natural influence in repressing causes of complaint in relation to the fisheries. Therefore, since March 3, 1887, no case has been reported to the Department of State wherein complaint was made of unfriendly or unlawful treatment of American fishing vessels on the part of the Canadian authorities in which reparation was not promptly and satisfactorily obtained by the United States consul-general at Halifax.

A single case of alleged unjust treatment of an American merchant vessel, not engaged in fishing, has been reported since March 3, 1887. This was the ship Bridgewater, which was first brought to the attention of the Department of State by the claimant by petition filed June 1, 1888.

On June 18, 188-, legal counsel, who appeared and desired to be heard, filed their formal authority, and the claim was at once duly investigated, and on June 22, 1888, a communication was addressed by the Secretary of State to the British minister, which sets forth the history of the claim, and a copy of which is herewith transmitted; and of this formal acknowledgment was made, but no further reply has been received.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 12, 1888.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the message be printed, and, together with accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; also that the House had receded from its disagreement to the one hundred and sixteenth amendment of the Senate, and agreed to the same; that it had agreed to the one hundred and nineteenth amendment of the Senate with an amendment; that it further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, numbered 105, 106, 107, 110, 118, 121, 127, 128, 221, 222, 223, 233, 234, 236, 238, 239, 240, 242, 243, 244, 248, 254, 255, 256, and 257; that it agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FORNEY, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. RYAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5336) for the relief of George B. Hansell; and

A bill (H. R. 2686) for the relief of William Knowland.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3501) relating to the classification of post-offices and amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3543) granting a pension to Benjamin W. Botts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 3544) granting a pension to Alice Kelly, late volunteer Army nurse; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3545) granting a pension to Therese Vidlene as dependent sister; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3546) granting a pension to Mary A. Wells; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3547) for the relief of Francis Palms et al.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. TURPIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the sundry civil appropriation bill has been returned from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, September 12, 1888.

Resolved, That the House recedes from its disagreement to the one hundred and sixteenth amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; and agrees to the same.

Resolved, That the House agrees to the one hundred and nineteenth amendment of the Senate to said bill with amendments as follows:

In line 10 of said Senate amendment strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

In line 11 of said Senate amendment strike out the words "and fifty."

In line 11 of said Senate amendment after the word "dollars" insert the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

In line 11 of said Senate amendment after the word "dollars" insert the following:

"And the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress, on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation; and all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes, and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law."

In line 11 of said Senate amendment strike out all after the word "dollars."

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to said bill numbered as follows: 105, 106, 107, 110, 118, 121, 127, 128, 221, 222, 223, 233, 234, 236, 238, 239, 240, 242, 243, 244, 248, 254, 255, 256, and 257, and agrees to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Mr. FORNEY, Mr. BURNES, and Mr. RYAN be the managers of the further conference on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and disagree to the amendments proposed by the House to our amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator is unnecessary, the Senate having already asked a conference on this bill and the House of Representatives having agreed to the request.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Chair if it would be in order for the Senate now to recede from its amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I suppose it would be necessary that we should disagree to the House amendments to our amendments in order to have a conference. If I am mistaken, of course I do not make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the state of the bill examined and call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to it hereafter.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment that I may ask a question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I should like the attention of the Senator from Iowa. I desire the Senator, either now or when the bill comes again before the Senate on the conference report, to state the condition of the disagreements between the two Houses. I did not catch it very well from the reading of the message. I ask him to make the statement either now or at some future time before the matter is disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. I apologize to the Chair. I find that the Senate has already further insisted on its amendments and asked for a conference, which the House has now granted. So the Chair was right, and I was wrong in submitting a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] appeals to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]——

Mr. ALLISON. As to the disagreeing votes?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. What is the condition of the disagreement now between the House and Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. There are several amendments, but the questions involved are not very numerous. The first disagreeing vote relates to the allowance to the widow of Professor Baird. The next is in regard to the Library. The next is the limitation put upon the public-land provision, on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire in that connection if the bill will at any stage be open to a motion to be made to strike out the extraordinary appropriations in it for the purpose of agents and investigations? I think I shall be able to show that they are unnecessary and that they are leading to much evil.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill has gone from the control of the Senate except in so far as the amendments have not been agreed to by both Houses.

The next amendment, in importance at least, is the amendment respecting irrigation, which was put on in the Senate. The House of Representatives have agreed to that amendment with a modification appropriating $100,000, and as Senators probably noticed by the reading at the desk, they have put certain limitations and qualifications upon the appropriation.

Mr. PLATT. Do you agree to that?

Mr. ALLISON. We have not yet. That is one of the questions for the conference.

The next important amendment is in regard to the purchase of a site for a new public building for the city post-office. The next important amendment disagreed to, I believe, by the House, is one respecting the zoological park.

I believe I have stated all the important amendments now in dispute. There are one or two minor amendments, which are not now in my memory, but I believe these comprise the amendments in dispute and not agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. The matter on which I wished to be particularly informed was the condition of the amendment put on by the Senate in relation to irrigation.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment has been modified, and my motion was that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by the House which of course will carry that amendment of the House into the conference.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator from Iowa as to the condition of the amendment in relation to the new Library building?

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment has been disagreed to by the House. I think they have not undertaken to amend it, but have disagreed to the Senate provision.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that on an examination of the bill hastily made it appears that the House has amended the proposition for reservoirs by striking out $150,000, leaving the appropriation $100,000 instead of $250,000, as the Senate proposed. They have also reserved not simply the reservoirs which we had reserved from occupation, but all the lands that are susceptible of irrigation below.

That has evidently happened because the House could not have understood what the real result would be. That is equivalent to saying in the State of Colorado, if a reservoir should be located on the head of a stream, that all the land below that should be reserved. There are thousands of acres that may still be irrigated by the waters of the stream. It would practically withdraw in Colorado and in some parts of Nevada all of what we call the arid lands, all the lands that have to be irrigated. That part will not do. It will be no benefit to the Western country at all. If you put that in we should be worse off than if we had nothing at all. It would be worse than a disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole subject will be under the urisd iction of the committee of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that the conferees appointed will undoubtedly confer with Senators respecting these amendments.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on Printing. A resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the message of the President and the report of the Pacific Railroad Commission. We find also in the hands of the Printing Committee a resolution of the House proposing to print 10,000 copies. The committee combined the two and move the postponement of the resolution just referred to it, and the amendment of the House resolution to make the number 15,000—5,000 for the Senate and 10,000 for the House—and as so amended recommend the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resolution will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection, and the resolution of the House will be read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for immediate action on it.

The House resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying reports of the majority and minority of the Pacific Railroad Commission.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was stated to be in line 3, after the word "House," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen."

Mr. HAWLEY. That was not the amendment as I instructed the clerk of the committee to draw it. Does it say at the end "5,000 for the Senate and 10,000 for the House?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 15,000 copies, for the use of the House 10,000, and for the use of the Senate 5,000 copies, of the President's message and accompanying reports of the majority and minority of the Pacific Railroad Commission.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid aside until the amendment can be properly prepared.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

MYRA FREEMAN.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 4th of January, 1888, I introduced a bill (S. 1152) granting a pension to Myra Freeman, and on March 13 a similar bill was introduced, No. 2343. On the 17th of April, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] reported Senate bill No. 1152 adversely, on the ground that the pension application was still pending in the Pension Office. Now I desire to withdraw Senate bill 2343, and to introduce a new bill and have it referred to the Committee on Pensions, the Pension Office in the mean time having rejected the application. The first bill was indefinitely postponed, but no action was had on the second bill. I desire the Committee on Pensions discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2343) granting a pension to Mrs. Myra Freeman, and the bill indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I introduce the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 3548) granting a pension to Mrs. Myra Freeman was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States; and

A bill (S. 3447) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes.

POSTAL CRIMES.

Mr. VEST. There has been returned from the House of Representatives an amendment to the bill in relation to postal crimes, which I ask may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3447) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888, and for other purposes, which were on page 2, lines 2 and 3, to strike out "92" and insert "93," and on page 2, line 6, to strike out "section 3892" and insert "section 3893."

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

KILLING OF JOSEPH HOFFMAN, WASHINGTON COUNTY, TEXAS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. SPOONER in relation to the killing of Joseph Hoffman, in Washington County, Texas.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, in listening to this protracted and somewhat excited, certainly pathetic and solemn, debate, the question must arise, I think, in the mind of every Senator cui bono, what good? For twenty-five years facts like these have been brought to the Senate Chamber, discussions like this have taken place, investigating committees have been appointed, investigations have followed, reports have been made, legislation has been enacted, and here to-day it is more true than it ever has been before in the history of the country that the conditions still exist out of which all this has grown.

If the ballot was ever suppressed, it is suppressed to-day. If freedom of debate was ever violated, it is violated in some portions of this country to-day. The Senate knows it, the country knows it, and by reason of the absolute certainty and fixity of the situation the country is somewhat indifferent to it. It is like being informed that you have a mortal disease. You will become reconciled to death and go quietly to—

> The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
> No traveler returns.

That is the condition of the country, and that is the reason why this debate to-day will hardly stir a single ripple over the surface of the North, still less of the South. The resolution will pass, the investigation will take place, the facts will be demonstrated, as they have been in a hundred instances before, the report will come before the Senate, and it will all vanish into thin air.

But, as I was saying, if there is any change, things have become worse. Both Senators from Texas intimate to us that they have already gone to such an extent that the Republicans in that State, being either eliminated or silenced as an active force in politics, the Democrats have now gone to killing each other, and they rather protest against the idea that there should be discussion upon the subject, although the whole thing is so evidently the outgrowth of political conditions.

So I inquire again, Mr. President, what good? There can be only one remedy, and that has been often suggested. It has been often put aside by the Senators from Texas. One of those Senators touched upon it when he said to us that in their State they were giving to the colored man, and I suppose he would be understood to include the poorest white man, equal conditions in the direction of education; and there is the remedy and the only remedy, the only balm there is in Gilead, the only physician that will ever succeed in removing this mortal disease of illiteracy.

It was in consequence of this view of the subject that I rose to ask the attention of the Senators from Texas and of the whole country to an article which I find in the New York World of this morning. It is what is known as a signed article, and I will read an extract from it:

NATIONAL AID FOR COMMON SCHOOLS.

The nation, not less than the States, is dependent for prosperity and security upon the intelligence and morality of the people—

This is from a very high order of signed article in the New York World—

The nation, not less than the States, is dependent for prosperity and security upon the intelligence and morality of the people. This common interest very early suggested national aid in the establishment and endowment of schools and colleges in the new States. There is, I believe, a present exigency that calls for still more liberal and direct appropriations in aid of common-school education in the States.

This article in the World is signed by "Benjamin Harrison," and I commend the whole article to the careful consideration of the entire Senate and of the entire country, but particularly the proposition which I have read.

Mr. President, in this connection I wish to read another article from another newspaper. It is a voice from Texas herself, and it is the utterance of the Democratic Exponent, published at Corsicana, Tex., dated Friday, September 7, 1888, a Texas paper which in one article I find here takes pains to say, as it ought to say:

We thought the right thing was done when Judge REAGAN was elected United States Senator.

It criticises some things the Senator may have done, but I read that language from the paper in order that it may not be supposed that the paper itself is one abounding with race or political prejudice, especially against either of the Senators from that State. The article bears directly upon the subject-matter of the quotation which I have read, the signed article in the New York World, and I will send this to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the Senator seek to have it understood that that is a Democratic paper?

Mr. BLAIR. The New York World? Yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no; but the paper from which he reads.

Mr. BLAIR. It says "Democratic" on the outside of it.

Mr. REAGAN. It is malignant.

Mr. BLAIR. It did not seem to be malignant. I saw nothing to indicate any malignant feeling towards anybody in the paper. The Secretary will please read the article, commencing near the top of the second column.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the article, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONDITION OF THE BLAIR BILL.

This bill passed the Senate in December last by a vote of 39 to 29, the remaining ten Senators being paired. It went to the House and was referred to the House Committee on Education, a committee that has little or nothing to do. Some believe that that committee was appointed by the Speaker for the purpose of smothering the bill and so preventing the House from considering it at all. For nearly eight months the bill has been smothered by the so-called Democrats belonging to the committee keeping away from committee meetings, so as to prevent a vote upon the report by preventing a quorum. At any time the chairman of the committee could get a quorum by handing the names of the absentees to the Sergeant-at-Arms and telling him he wanted a quorum. But probably Mr. CARLISLE appointed that chairman to not do that.

Committees, in all parliamentary bodies, are appointed to report bills, not to smother them. What would be the effect of reporting the Blair bill? There would be two reports, the majority one unfavorable. Upon presentation in the House there would be a motion made by the friends of the bill to substitute the minority for the majority report. If that motion carried, the bill would be passed by the House. Then it would rest altogether with the President whether the bill became a law or not. If he disapproved it and vetoed it, that would end it. Twenty-nine noes in the Senate and the President's veto would kill any bill.

Beyond question, then, the object of the smothering of the bill by the House Committee on Education is to prevent the President from declaring how he stands upon that bill. Who knows how Mr. Cleveland stands on it? Perhaps it is nobody's business. American citizens have no right to know. To keep them from knowing it is deemed worth while, by the Speaker of the House, to stock a committee to smother a bill and so prevent the representatives of the American people from voting upon it.

That is the whole affair in a nut-shell. The Blair bill has received the treatment it has solely to keep the American people from knowing how Mr. Cleveland regards it. They evidently have no right to know, and no rights worth considering. How much Democracy is there in a party that takes such a position? Would it not be brave to keep up the bill and, if it should pass, let Mr. Cleveland veto? But the worst of it is, the people are asked by their votes to approve the way of doing.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, these discussions are likely to go on interminably and these investigations to go on interminably until there is a radical change in the conditions of society at large where these occurrences take place. I am in favor of the investigations, because such occurrences are violations of individual and personal right, they are dangerous violations of such right in the way of precedent for the future; but I do not believe that there is any remedy save in the application of moral and educational causes which shall so elevate the general conditions of society everywhere, in all parts of the country, as that every individual right shall be held sacred and shall be defended and vindicated by the utmost exertion of the intellectual and physical force of all. And I think the Senators from Texas and the Senators from the North as well, while giving full scope to the spirit of inquiry and the fixing of the responsibility for acts, whatever they may be, in violation of law, should look rather to the remedy to prevent the repetition of such evil things in the future; and if our Democrats would establish for themselves due protection against the domination of the Southern Republican, the Southern negro Republican of which the Senators from Texas complain with such a pathetic wail—if they will do that for the protection of the Southern Democrat as well as the Southern Republican, let them do something to assist in the moral and intellectual education of the masses of the children among them, and they will do that which is to some purpose; but until that be done and the conditions of society be made not only homogeneous, but be elevated, these evil deeds will continue, violence will be perpetrated upon the ballot-box at the South, the violations of the right of suffrage, to which allusion has been made, which occurred in Cincinnati will be repeated in our great cities all over the country and wherever the conditions exist of ignorance, illiteracy, and consequent degradation and carelessness as to the exercise and protection of human rights. Wherever those conditions continue to exist, these crimes will be the natural consequence, and we might, I think, direct our attention to the remedy as well as to the evils complained of.

I just call attention to this in passing, for I do not mean, so far as I am concerned, that the discussion of these Southern conditions, which are before the country again in the resolutions of investigation which have been introduced here—justifiably and properly introduced—shall go on without specific attention being directed to the only conceivable remedy, a remedy the possibility of applying which is the only justification for the agitation of these subjects here.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I will occupy the attention of the Senate but a few moments.

The Senator from Texas who last addressed the Senate [Mr. REAGAN] seemed to complain that I had imputed to his colleague, my friend, the other Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], a reliance upon a newspaper as evidence of a fact contained, and then referred also to an item of news in the New York Herald which I had adduced on the same subject. My point was not the reliance on a newspaper communication simply and in general, but that the Senator had chosen to impute to Mr. Joe Hoffman the quality of being a Democrat upon a mere newspaper reference to him in that relation, when all the evidence taken and all the public facts show that Mr. Hoffman was and always had been a Republican.

In regard to the item in the New York Herald, I have no responsibility for that. The Senator from Texas commented upon that by saying it was obviously partial by reason of the comments that it made. Well, the comment that I cited it for was for stating that Mr. Hoffman was a Republican. That did not seem to be a very inflammatory observation in regard to the meaning of Mr. Hoffman's relation to the matter which resulted in his death.

The Senator, too, has chosen to insist upon what I readily recognize, and which I distinctly stated in my observations, that the occurrence of violence of this kind by itself gave no right to impugn or to inculpate the community at large. The question, therefore, of whether the community involves itself in that inculpation depends upon how it proceeds to deal with the authors of the occurrence, and the imputations that I have made in regard to the occurrence two years ago in the way of inculpation of that community in its treatment of it have been based upon the evidence produced before the committee, and is just as apparent upon the evidence which the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has read, even in that portion of it. The governor, the local community, the authorities, the Democratic party, the public press, the public opinion of Texas, never frowned at all upon that transaction in any shape. The grand jury never took any action upon it whatever. There was no pretense that the community had purged itself or desired to purge itself of a just inculpation of entire indifference to that transaction.

That is what I meant by saying that an occurrence of violence does not inculpate a community, but the community's treatment of it exposes it to the judgment of judicious and honest comment and judicious and honest condemnation, and that is all that I have indulged in.

The Senator from Texas proceeded further to say that at a place in that State, Lampasas or Fort Bend, or some other point of that kind, there had been a murder, certainly a homicide, and as he would call it, and perhaps justly, for I know nothing about it, the murder of two white Democrats, or one killed, perhaps, and one wounded with the intent to kill. I think that was the situation. He finds fault with the Senator from Wisconsin and myself for not having had any sympathy for the widows and the children of those unfortunate victims or violence.

When have I or when has the Senator from Wisconsin been remiss in his attention of sympathy with regard to any suffering that has been inflicted by that crime? I know nothing about them. I do not know whether they had wives or children; nor is it right to bring into a controversy in this way suggestions that are mere insinuations without the least foundation. We have expressed sympathy in the transaction which ended in the death of Mr. Hoffman and of Mr. Holt, and I appeal on the common ground of humanity to both sides of this Chamber to observe the heroism of Joe Hoffman and to pity his sad fate.

It will not do to say that we are indifferent to transactions of violence or to homicide or to murder or to sufferings of the families of the victims, until the consideration of those matters becomes a proper subject for the Senate to inquire into and make itself responsible for.

I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the resolution goes to that committee under the rules without a formal order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the resolution be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall not vote for that resolution. I think there is a great deal in the question propounded by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. We have had investigations, investigations that we had no right to make—I mean where there was no necessity to make them—instituted alone for political purposes. The country fully understands that all those investigations have no other basis than a simple desire to promote the interests of the political party that starts them in the Senate of the United States.

If the Senator had propounded another question, "what harm they do?" I should have been ready to say that the first was the disgrace which such investigations bring upon the Senate of the United States, for I hold that it is a disgrace to constitute this high body into a political machine to advance the interests by such means of a political candidate for the Presidency. Whatever disclaimers may be made by Senators of any such motives, whatever high purposes they may avow as instigating these investigations, the people of this country know that at the very foundation of all of them is the simple desire to advance the interests of their party, and to go by steps that they have no right to take to accomplish this purpose.

I have served upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections and been engaged in some of these investigations. I have been down to

New Orleans twice on investigations into the condition of affairs in that section of the country, and I say here, standing in my place in the Senate and upon my responsibility as a Senator, that I have never seen one of these political investigations conducted with the least adherence to the rules of justice. The whole animus has been to make political capital for the party that initiated the investigations, and this resolution has the same purpose in view, and the country knows it. I do not hesitate to say here that there is not an intelligent man in the country but knows full well that the animus that moves such investigations is a political purpose, and not because they are expected to accomplish any good whatever.

What right have you to go down? What right has the Senate to go down to investigate a local murder unconnected with politics perhaps, except for the purpose of trying to make political capital?

I repeat again, sir, it is a disgrace to the Senate of the United States that these investigations should be instituted and conducted in the manner they are, and I do not hesitate to say that I am sorry to see men occupying high positions in this country, Senators, resorting to such means to accomplish party purposes. I do not object to partisanship, for I am a partisan myself, but I do object to the Senate of the United States, a body of which we are all proud to be members, being converted into a political machine, thus making use of the Senate of the United States for the purpose of investigations that have no proper foundation, merely to excite the prejudices of the people of the North against the people of the South.

Murders take place all over the country. Unfortunately humanity is so constituted that crime will exist wherever man exists in large communities, and no investigation is made, no inquiry is made into the causes of murders and of riots in the Northern section of the country. The investigation is all confined to some portions of the Southern States for the purpose of inciting the prejudices of some parts of this country against that section with a view to political effect on elections. We are doing harm, not only disgracing the Senate, but I aver as my honest conviction that such a proceeding, tending to keep up the spirit of animosity between the races in the South, is reprehensible in every point of view in which it can be looked at.

I enter my protest here and now against all such procedure on the part of the Senate, and I hope that the country will take notice and hold to responsibility the men who initiate and carry out these partisan investigations through the agency of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the unconscious admission made by the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who has just taken his seat. The Senator from Delaware seems to admit, and does admit in substance, that the stopping of political murders, that the calling of public attention and public indignation down upon them, and the establishing of a free ballot and a fair count is the same thing with the advantage of the Republican party. It is. The Senator is quite right.

I have no doubt that in that very district in Texas where these things have happened, the district now represented by the author of the Mills bill, if there could be an honest and a fair debate on public questions, not interrupted by murder and violence, the people of that district itself would pronounce by a large majority against this raid upon the industries and the interests of the wage-earners of this country.

There is one other significant piece of testimony which came out in that investigation. These were murders and exiles of white men as well as of colored men. The witnesses who testified that they had been compelled to go and leave their homes as exiles were white men. One of them had been a Confederate soldier who served through the war, and the question was put to the Democratic witnesses as to the character of these men: "Have they done anything wrong in their relations as citizens? Were they not honest? Did they bear a high character?" "Certainly; we do not deny that, except in their political conduct." "What was their political conduct? What did they undertake to do, and what is the matter with that?" "Oh, they make," was the answer in substance; I do not give the language now, but the substance—"they make inflammatory speeches to the negroes." "What is the nature of the inflammatory speeches that these men make to the negroes?" "Why, they tell the negroes that if the Democratic party remain in power their wages will be lowered, and if the Republican party come into power their wages will be raised." In other words, they use the argument which both sides are presenting to the workingmen of this country as the issue upon which this election is largely to be determined.

If a party takes the ground which Washington, and Jefferson, and Hamilton, and Madison, and Webster, and Clay took, that the policy now advocated by the Republican party will enhance the wages of the workingmen, increasing the price of cotton among other things, that is an incendiary appeal to the race prejudices of the negroes in the eyes of the dominant party in the Mills district of Texas!

I do not propose, Mr. President, at this hour of the evening, to enter upon this debate; but having had some considerable observation of this class of questions, I wish to put upon record my opinion that this is not a question of negro or race domination over white men in those Southern States where these things happen. When we undertake to show that large numbers of votes are suppressed, that the elections there do not represent the free will of their people, they answer us: "Why, your fallacy in that is in claiming that all the colored votes are on your side; the negroes are sick of the Republican party and are voting the Democratic ticket in large numbers." But when we come to say, "Let them vote; let their votes be cast and counted," they answer, "Oh, it is a race issue, and you are in favor of putting the white man under the domination of the colored man."

Under a fair count and a full count and free speech, the colored men, as the white men throughout this country, will divide, will differ in opinion, will divide according to their judgment or their interests, and whenever or wherever that condition of affairs is established education, wealth, business capacity, character will have, as everywhere in a republic, its full, free, proportionate influence.

It is not a question of race domination, according to my belief. It is not possible for the white people of a single State in this Union, under the influence of republican ideas and republican methods (I use the word "republican" now in the large sense to cover the ideas upon which this Republic is based), to be under the domination of the people of the other race.

This method is a method of keeping Democratic superiority and supremacy in States where that party would otherwise be in the minority, and, through those States, in the nation. It is not a race question. The men who do these things in Mississippi are not Mississippi. Mississippi lies prostrate under their feet. The men who do these things in Texas are not Texas, or will not long remain Texas. It is that they may keep Texas prostrate beneath their feet that these things are done.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has just taken his seat, has in a few minutes misrepresented and perverted more testimony than has been treated in that way by everybody else in this debate to-day.

He says it is not race antagonism that produces the troubles in Washington and Fort Bend Counties. He says that the real sentiment of the people of Texas is in some way suppressed and dominated and falsified in its expression; that the people of Texas favor a protective tariff if they were permitted to say so. That Senator talks about something of which he is profoundly ignorant. The Senator from Massachusetts is informed about what transpires in Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. I will.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator say that it is a race issue there? Does he say that these murders are the act of Texas?

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me to proceed I will answer his question.

Mr. HOAR. But the honorable Senator challenged my statement as being erroneous on these two points. I want to know whether he agrees with me or disagrees with me?

Mr. COKE. The Senator will see as I proceed. The Senator's statement is erroneous. The murder of young Bolton was a cold-blooded murder, perpetrated by negroes. When he went to the polls to inquire the state of the vote he was unarmed and unaccompanied by anybody, and there were eight or ten people about the polls. He could not have intended a raid on the ballot-box; he was not disguised. He simply went as a citizen interested in knowing what the state of the vote was, and he was shot down.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas permit me——

Mr. COKE. I decline to be interrupted by the Senator from Wisconsin. The man was shot down before he could make an inquiry.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not decline to be interrupted by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. The people who killed Bolton—that is, the man who shot him and those who were accessories to the murder—were arrested. The testimony shows that, fearing that in the condition of the public mind some violence would be done them, they were taken away from Brenham. Some of them were carried to Houston, and I think the man who fired the shot and committed the murder was carried to the Milam County jail. They were kept until it was believed that the excitement had subsided, and those who were carried to Houston were brought back to Brenham. A mob of disguised men did assemble and take three of them out of the Brenham jail and hang them. The man who actually killed Bolton—whom they would not bring back to Brenham—is yet alive and in jail, if he has not been tried. The Senator from Wisconsin stated here some weeks ago that these men were hanged not because they were accessories to this most foul and brutal murder but in order to get them out of the way as witnesses to the violence done to the ballot-box.

These men were taken out of jail and hung just as men have been taken out of jail and hung in nearly every county and in every State in this Union.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, speak for Texas; do not speak for Connecticut.

Mr. COKE. I will venture the assertion that when Connecticut was a new State occurrences of that character transpired there. I do not believe that there is a State in this Union where they have not transpired.

I do not justify the men who took these people out of prison and hung them. I do not justify law-breaking, but I do say that the impulse upon which these people acted in taking these men out of jail and hanging them was one that has moved men to similar performances in every State in this Union, and I may almost say in every county in every State in the Union at some time or other.

Mr. HAWLEY. I may as well, perhaps, satisfy the Senator at this point as to one State. I challenge him to find in the history of Connecticut from 1635 to the present time a single case of hanging by mob violence.

Mr. COKE. I take it for granted, of course, that the Senator is better informed than I can be about Connecticut, but Connecticut is an exception. I will say then all the States except Connecticut. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator must also except New Hampshire. I have never known of a hanging of that kind being done in that State.

Mr. COKE. Why, Mr. President, go to all the Western States, and you will scarcely find a county in which there has not been mob violence and in which men have not been hanged by mobs. Our Texas people do not pretend to be better than the people elsewhere. We have got a large amount of human nature in us, exactly the sort of human nature that is found in men everywhere else.

It is wrong that these negroes were taken out of jail and hanged; but it was done because it was believed that they had assisted in the murder of young Bolton, and that was all there was about it. There was nothing political in it. There was no motive in it that had anything in the world to do with politics.

So in Fort Bend County, where men have been murdered recently because they were Democrats—avowedly murdered for that reason—the people have been conservative; they simply met together and adopted resolutions and ordered certain men whom they had good reason to believe (possibly not amounting to legal proof) had been guilty of these murders, these assassinations—ordered them to leave the county.

Men have to take care of themselves; they will take care of themselves. In Fort Bend County and in Washington County where blood has been spilled, murders and assassinations committed, the victims have been Democrats invariably. About this there is no question or doubt.

The hanging done at Brenham was the work of a mob, which we can attribute to but one cause, and that is that poor human nature under excitement was carried away by feeling and led to a violation of law.

I desire the fact to be specially remembered that in no case that has come from Texas have Democrats been the aggressors or have white men been the aggressors. Bolton was killed by a Republican negro. Shamblin, of Fort Bend, was killed by a Republican and a notice tacked to his gate that he was killed because he was a Democrat. Captain Frost, of Fort Bend, was shot and severely wounded when going into his yard at night because he was a Democrat and a white man.

Notwithstanding these admitted facts the Senator from Wisconsin desires an investigating committee to take hold of and look into the matters referred to. The resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin refers to matters not under the Federal jurisdiction, having nothing in the world to do with anything over which this Senate has jurisdiction, yet the Senate is asked to make an investigation, and, as if to illustrate the absurdity of the proceeding, the Senator from Massachusetts, when he comes to make his contribution to the debate, finds it is not the race issue, it is not race prejudice or antagonism which produces disturbance, but it is a desire to suppress the vote of people who favor a protective tariff!

How does the Senator from Massachusetts find this out? The Senator sneers at Colonel MILLS, who represents the district embracing Washington County. Let him sneer at Colonel MILLS before the people and on the stump, where Colonel MILLS has a chance to reply to him.

Mr. HOAR. I have said nothing about Colonel MILLS.

Mr. COKE. You said it was Colonel MILLS's district.

Mr. HOAR. That is another thing.

Mr. COKE. You said it was in the district represented by ROGER MILLS. ROGER MILLS is able to answer for himself, and if the Senator desires to meet ROGER MILLS, ROGER MILLS will go to Boston and discuss the tariff question with him, and be glad of the opportunity.

No, Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. These troubles in Washington County had their origin, not in Federal politics, but in local county politics. The people in Washington County, as the testimony shows, have been plundered and robbed and stolen from by people like these three who memorialized the Senate until they have gotten tired of it. Democrats and Republicans who had property to be taxed, who had substance in the county, joined and made a People's ticket and obtained control of the county; and since 1886 Democrats and Republicans together have held the offices of the county and they have had honest administrations. Before that time they were plundered. There is a man in the penitentiary now who was county treasurer, I believe—at all events was one of the high officers. They were indicted, these Radical, corrupt officials, repeatedly indicted, indicted, too, when the judge having jurisdiction and holding court was a Republican judge, when the county attorney and the district attorney were Republicans, when the sheriff was a Republican, and the same Republican judge is in office now. Republican officials had cognizance and jurisdiction of these men who hung the three negroes at Brenham.

They say Governor Ireland offered no reward for the discovery of the persons who hung the negroes. Who drew the grand jury? Whose duty was it to prosecute? Whose business was it to see to it that those people were prosecuted? It was Judge McFarland's business, and Judge McFarland is a Republican. It was the business of the county and district attorneys, who also were Republicans.

The county and the district attorneys are Republicans, and were Republicans when some fifteen or twenty indictments were returned into court under the instruction of the Republican judge against the thieves and robbers who under the lead of the three men who appear before this Senate as memorialists had gotten possession of the offices of Washington County.

Why, Mr. President, the Germans of Washington County constitute one-half of the voters. They are nearly all Republicans. But they deliberately turned their backs upon the Republican party and fused with the Democrats and elected county officers in 1886, and are still co-operating with the Democrats in county elections. They vote the national Republican ticket. Washington County gives a large majority for the national Republican ticket; but when you come to county elections they can not stand these people who have been plundering and robbing them, and they do not vote the straight Republican ticket. Men like Hackworth and Schutze and Moore, so lauded by the Senators from Wisconsin and New York, are the men who drive the Germans to co-operation with the Democrats in county elections.

The Senator from Massachusetts sees nothing but a suppression of the vote on the protective-tariff issue in these disorders in Washington County; sees nothing of race prejudice, nothing of race antagonism. He simply knows nothing in the world about it.

I do not believe that the Senator from Massachusetts would knowingly make a misstatement. I have no idea that he would do so; but he has made misstatements this evening, and made as many of them in a few minutes as I ever heard made in the same length of time—statements that had no particle of foundation for them. A freer people, black and white, Democrat and Republican, in speech and in casting the ballot, does not live than those in Texas.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question there? Has he seen in the newspapers this very morning the statement that the Republican party of Texas have said that in consideration of these crimes and this violence they will not undertake to put a State ticket in the field? Is that a slander also?

Mr. COKE. Now, Mr. President I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not believe the same number of letters have ever been put together in the English language to express a grosser or more palpable falsehood than that. The Republicans afraid to put a ticket in the field! It is simply preposterous. There is not a Republican in Texas who is not as fearless of consequences in his political or other action as the Senator from Massachusetts is when he is at home in Massachusetts. That is the truth.
